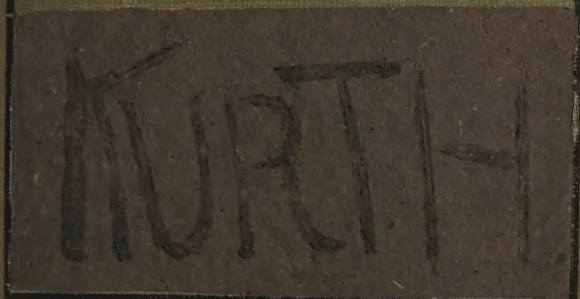
THE WINDSOR ENGLISH CLASSICS

LIBRARY OF THE MILWAUKEE SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING

MACAULAY'S LIFE OF JOHNSON



Frederic L. Huidekoper

T. J. Kinsella
Lake Forest Academy
Lake Forest Illinois

LIBRARY
OF ENGINEERING
SCHOOL

Dec. 1925

MACAULAY'S
LIFE OF JOHNSON

EDITED BY

STEWART LEE GARRISON

ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH AND PUBLIC SPEAKING
AMHERST COLLEGE

PR
3533
.M3
1923

F. M. AMBROSE AND COMPANY
NEW YORK AND BOSTON
1923

COPYRIGHT 1923
BY
F. M. AMBROSE AND COMPANY

AMBROSE PRESS
NORWOOD, MASS.

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION TO MACAULAY'S Life of Johnson

A. The Essay as a Form of Literature . . . 9
B. Life of Macaulay 13
C. Macaulay the Man 25
D. Macaulay's Position in English Literature . . 33
E. Macaulay's Style 39
F. Macaulay on Johnson 44
G. Johnson's London and Its Influence upon Him . 46
H. Boswell as Biographer 50
I. Bibliography 53

THE LIFE OF SAMUEL JOHNSON 55
NOTES 115
APPENDICES 149
A. Descriptive List of Johnson's Work . . . 149
B. Chronological Table 154
C. The Meeting of Dr. Johnson and Wilkes, from Boswell's Johnson 156
D. Lesson Assignments and College Entrance Questions for Review 159

ILLUSTRATIONS

SAMUEL JOHNSON (From the Statue in St. Clement Danes Churchyard) . . . . . Frontispiece
LORD MACAULAY 15
BIRTHPLACE AND STATUE OF DR. JOHNSON IN LICHFIELD 57
JOHNSON'S HOME IN THE TEMPLE 83
JAMES BOSWELL 97
MRS. THRALE 101

PREFACE

This edition, it is hoped, has two merits: it attempts to reach an intelligent mean between overediting and underediting, and it contains some convenient drudgery-saving devices for student and teacher. It has been the desire of the editor so to guide the student's approach to Macaulay's essay that the secondary purpose of the essayist—namely, to interest—may be made to no great extent subordinate to the primary purpose, to give information. As the critic Gosse is later quoted: "The most restive of juvenile minds, if induced to enter one of Macaulay's essays, is almost certain to appear at the end of it gratified and to an appreciable extent, cultivated." It is hoped that the introduction will quicken rather than deaden interest. As for the drudgery-saving aids in the appendix, it would surely be a work of supererogation to offer apologies for presenting devices easing and reducing endless school tasks.

S. L. G.

INTRODUCTION

THE ESSAY AS A FORM OF LITERATURE

Nearly 350 years ago — in 1580, to be exact — a French retired lawyer, Michel de Montaigne, gave to the world a small volume which, according to an eminent critic, Saintsbury, has been second in influence to hardly any of modern times. This little book was entitled simply Essais. Its sole object was to leave for his friends a mental portrait of the author, defects and all, and a record of his personal opinions and affairs. Its very title is accurately expressive of its tentative nature : it was composed of a series of short compositions, each a " trial, attempt, or endeavor," in no sense a finished production, or comprehensive in scope. The subjects covered were multitudinous and diverse, from Friendship to Fleas. To Montaigne is given the credit of being the father of the modern essay, for though there were many short prose compositions before his time, he first gave a name to the form and illustrated it by his own writing. His remarkable influence is due first of all to the ease and flexibility of his style. As Saintsbury says, " All the great prose writers of France could not fail to be influenced by the racy phrase, the quaint and picturesque vocabulary, and the unconstrained constructions of Montaigne." But the subject matter of his essays had even greater influence. The deftness of his ironic and yet humorous touch was altogether

§ 1. The origin of the essay

fresh. He is comparable only to Charles Lamb in the quaint felicity with which he treated human comedy. A certain grotesque and fantastic wisdom in his comments on mankind was both new and irresistible. The secret of his effectiveness lay in the personal touch; he wrote subjectively. William Hazlitt, another nineteenth century English essayist who closely resembles him, says: "His greatest merit was that he may be said to have been the first who had the courage to say as an author what he felt as a man. . . . He was, in a word, the first author who was not a book-maker, and who wrote, not to make converts of others to established creeds and prejudices, but to satisfy his own mind of the truth of things. In this respect we know not which to be most charmed with, the author or the man." Subjectiveness of treatment, then, and picturesqueness of style along with a certain tentativeness and brevity were the four characteristics of the essay as Montaigne originated it.

§ 2. Development in England: two types

When the essay made its appearance in England about 1600, two of the characteristics so notable in Montaigne were missing. The essays in Bacon's first volume, published in 1597, were certainly concise and they were manifestly tentative, but they had not the easy, desultory, yet sparkling style of Montaigne, and more especially they lacked his delightful personal touch. This last deficiency, however, Bacon's successors in the seventeenth century supplied. Though they wrote mostly upon ethical and moral themes, they treated the themes from the subjective, the personal point of view. In the following century, Addison and Steele developed a different type, — the periodical essay, which dealt chiefly with manners and customs, politics and society. Though sprightly in style, this type was much less personal in touch. The nineteenth century

w the perfecting of the personal essay of the seven-enth century as well as of the impersonal of the ghteenth. The two types came to be recognized and stinguished. Lamb, DeQuincey, and Stevenson wrote miliar essays like such well-known ones as Roast Pig, nfessions of an English Opium Eater, and Travels th a Donkey. Macaulay, Carlyle, and Ruskin wrote rmally on historical and critical themes. Both types ve in common the two essential characteristics of an say, brevity and tentativeness. They differ, how-er, in purpose and in point of view. The formal say is written primarily to give information ; the miliar, to entertain. The formal essay is objective ; e author's personality is kept in the background. he familiar essay is subjective ; the author's person-ty is often the matter of chief interest, being similar this respect to the lyric poem.

An attempt is often made further to classify essays cording to subject matter. Such a classification can best be only a rough one, because many n be classified, for instance, both as bio- aphical and as critical, or as critical and storical. Yet there is some advantage in a assification according to subject matter : the student the effort to make the classification is led to analyze e nature of the essay and the purpose of the essayist. rmal essays are most generally critical, biographical, historical, though all of these kinds overlap. Fa-liar essays are most commonly humorous or satirical subject matter, but essays on travel are also very mmon, such as those of Irving in The Sketch Book. ddison and Steele's The Spectator was satirical, poking ndly fun at the " fads, foibles, and follies " of Queen ne's time. Charles Lamb's Essays of Elia are largely morous, amusing us by his informal talks on roast g, old china, and his sister Mary.

§ 3. Classification according to subject matter

§ 4. Macaulay's essays on Johnson classified

In classifying Macaulay's two essays concerning Samuel Johnson, there is no difficulty about determining the type : both are formal. Though each shows to no small extent the influence of the author's personality, neither was written from the personal point of view. But a classification according to subject matter is not so easy. When one considers that the first essay was a review for a periodical of Croker's edition of Boswell's Johnson, one would naturally classify it as critical ; the other, a biography of Johnson written for the Encyclopedia Britannica, one would suppose to be biographical. Yet both give the facts in Johnson's life, and both interpret and estimate Johnson's work. The earlier essay does, it is true, contain more pages of criticism, especially of Croker and of Boswell ; yet the later one contains much sounder criticism. The fact is that each essay is both critical and biographical. Some critics try to avoid the difficulty by classifying both as literary essays. In the end, however, it makes little difference how we classify the essays, so long as we understand what the essayist is doing and how he does it.

§ 5. Method of studying essays

To study by analysis a familiar essay would be to spoil it, for its very purpose, to entertain or at least to interest the reader, would be defeated. Any school boy will bear witness that even the most exciting adventure story is spoiled forever by classroom analysis. A formal essay, however, is written with a different purpose — primarily, to give information ; secondarily, to interest. Sometimes the second purpose is in no way subordinate to the first, but in general it is considered as the means, and the imparting of information the end. Thus, Macaulay, the most journalistic of formal essayists, can have paid to him by a great modern critic, Gosse, his famous compliment : "The most restive of ivenile minds, if induced to enter one of Macaulay's ssays, is almost certain to reappear at the other end f it gratified, and to an appreciable extent, cultivated." t is possible with Macaulay's Life of Johnson simply o turn a student loose with the essay and allow him o get what he pleases from it — and if he reads it at ll, he will get a great deal. But even a formal essay s so colored by the author's own experiences and outook that a knowledge of his life is of very great value. Iacaulay's essays, too, are so chock-full of allusions o history and literature, to political and educational stitutions, to the life and times of the subject, that ne's profit in reading is hugely increased by knowing eforehand something about these matters. Finally, ne has a natural curiosity about the author's methods, ne devices he uses to get a certain result — his style, short ; if this be understood, one's appreciation of ne essay will be greatly increased. In order to enhance ne student's appreciation and profit in the study of Iacaulay's Life of Johnson, the following pages aim to resent briefly a statement of the facts in the life of Iacaulay, a description of his appearance and personlity, an estimate of his position in literature and of his yle, and a sketch of some matters of interest in the mes of Doctor Johnson.

LIFE OF MACAULAY

Macaulay's life and work may best be summed up the statement that he was a typical Victorian. But here can not be applied to him that "dasardly epithet" Mid-Victorian, with its onnotation of over-ornate architecture, hutton-chop whiskers, and wasp-like waists. or his life was spent before the good queen had become so devoted to conventions and so dominated by the commonplace, if at times artificial, tastes of her husband that spontaneity was regarded as a crime. Even in Macaulay's day her reign had not the brilliance of Queen Elizabeth's. But the spirit of the age was much saner. It was a practical age, even a material one, an age of progress in arts and science alike, an age of honest efforts for reform in politics and social conditions. Macaulay, indefatigably industrious, highly successful as a writer of prose and of poetry, an orator and a historian of no mean ability, was typical of the best attributes of the early-Victorian age.

§ 6. Macaulay the Victorian

§ 7. His childhood distinguished by his precocity

Thomas Babington Macaulay was born October 25, 1800, at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire. His father, Zachary Macaulay, a good Scotch Presbyterian of an ancient family, had been governor of Sierra Leone, a West Africa Colony established as a home for liberated slaves. When in 1799 the colony began to prosper, Zachary returned to England and married Selina Mills, the daughter of a bookseller in Bristol, a member of the Society of Friends. To them a year later was born this son, one of the most precocious geniuses the world has ever known. His precocity startled everyone with whom he came in contact. His nephew and biographer, Trevelyan, tells a number of interesting details: "From the time that he was three years old he read incessantly, for the most part lying on the rug before the fire, with his book on the floor and a piece of bread-and-butter in his hand. . . . He did not care for toys, but was very fond of taking his walk, when he would hold forth to his companion, whether nurse or mother, telling interminable stories out of his own head, or repeating what he had been reading in language far above his years." When he was four years old, a servant spilled some hot coffee over his legs. "The hostess was all kindness and compassion, and when, after a while, she asked how he was feeling, the little fellow looked up in her face, and replied, 'Thank you, madam, the agony is abated.'" Before he was eight, his literary achievements were prodigious; he anticipated H. G. Wells by writing a Compendium of Universal History; he so liked Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel and Marmion that he memorized them; he wrote in a couple of days three cantos of one hundred and twenty lines each of a poem called The Battle of Cheviot; and he composed innumerable hymns — all this before he was eight.

LORD MACAULAY

§ 8. His early training

Fortunately for Macaulay, his exceptional gifts were most judiciously trained by his parents. They fostered his extraordinary ability without permitting him to parade it. They kept from him the knowledge that he was in any way superior to other children. As a result, he remained throughout his life remarkably free from vanity. They took pains, too, that he should not be spoiled by other older people. His mother encouraged him to visit Hannah More, a member of that famous coterie of literary women in Johnson's time known as the Blue Stockings. She was, according to Trevelyan, "the most affectionate and the wisest of friends, and readily undertook the superintendence of his studies, his pleasures, and his health. She would keep him with her for weeks, listening to him as he read prose by the ell, declaimed poetry by the hour, and discussed and compared his favorite heroes, ancient, modern, and fictitious . . . coaxing him into the garden under pretense of a lecture on botany; sending him from his books to run round the grounds, or play at cooking in the kitchen; giving him Bible lessons, which invariably ended in a theological argument, and following him with her advice and sympathy through his multifarious literary enterprises."

Fortunate indeed he was to have the influence of so wise a mentor.

When, in 1812, the boy had evidently outgrown the educational facilities of Clapham, his father contemplated sending him to the great London school of Westminster (called by the English "public" school, though really similar to our preparatory schools), but for religious reasons finally settled upon a small private school kept by a low-church minister at Little Shelford, a village near Cambridge. Mr. Preston, the tutor, was a good scholar but narrow in his views. He succeeded in preparing his pupils so well that they got far beyond their share of honors at Cambridge and in after life; but he so crammed them with theology especially of a Calvinistic type that many, including young Tom, developed a lifelong hatred for the outward manifestations of religion. Macaulay remained at Mr. Preston's school for six years. During his last four years there, the boy read "widely, unceasingly, more than rapidly." He was accumulating even then that enormous store of information for which he has ever been famous. § 9. His school days

This acquisitive process was continued throughout his six years at Trinity College, Cambridge, which he entered in 1818. He does not seem to have taken much pleasure in the regular college exercises, though he did them all conscientiously. He detested manufacturing Greek and Latin verse in cold blood as an exercise." Moreover, he found scientific subjects and mathematics so distasteful to him that he neglected them utterly, a dangerous liberty at Cambridge. He nevertheless became a bachelor of arts in 1821, a master of arts and a fellow in 1824. He wrote the prize poems in 1819 and 1821, and won in 1824 a college prize for an essay on the character of William III. His Cambridge experience was the happiest of his § 10. College life : he enjoyed the intellectual companionship of very able minds ; he indulged his voracious appetite for reading, and incidentally he stored his extraordinary memory with an enormous amount of miscellaneous information.

§ 11. Macaulay's memory and reading faculty

The secret of Macaulay's immense store of information lay in a two-fold gift of nature : first of all, he was a voracious and an omnivorous reader, and a most rapid one, for he could take in a whole page at a glance ; secondly, his memory was prodigious — it almost beggars description. He was able to repeat Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel after reading it through once. He said that if all the copies of Paradise Lost and The Pilgrim's Progress were destroyed, he could reproduce the whole of both. As a child, whatever pleased him, he remembered without consciously memorizing it. As he grew older, he no longer remembered involuntarily, but he was always able to memorize with the greatest ease. Nor did he ever lose his extraordinary faculty of assimilating printed matter at first sight. "He always read faster than other people skimmed, and this rapidity was not attained at the expense of accuracy."

Macaulay's exceptional ability might have won for him eminence in the profession he first chose, the law.

§ 12. His early writings

He was called to the bar in 1826, but he found legal technicalities not to his liking ; he spent most of his time in literary pursuits or in listening to the debates in the House of Commons. As Trevelyan put it, "Throughout life he never really applied himself seriously to any pursuit that was against the grain." Clients he had none, but by practising some economy he was able to live comfortably on his fellowship. His ambition was divided at the time between literature and politics. While he was at Cambridge, a very brilliant set of young men, who had been on the staff of the Etonian, started a quarterly maga-ine with the support of Mr. Charles Knight, an enter-rising publisher. Macaulay, though not of the group, as one of the chief contributors, much to the disleasure of his father, who did not approve of Knight's uarterly Magazine at all. In 1825 occurred an event hat gained for him real prominence. He published the renowned Edinburgh Review an Essay on Milton.

oung Macaulay, like Lord Byron, awoke one morning
o find himself famous. The pleasure of the public as all the greater in that the essay furnished a welcome elief from Dr. Johnson's Life of Milton, which was eally a libel upon the great poet. Everybody read nd admired the essay because the style was so new and o interesting. The article is, it must be confessed, ore notable for its style than for its critical accuracy ;
hough as a picture of the times of Charles I and Archishop Laud, of the Puritans and the Royalists, it is a rilliant piece of composition. It was shortly followed y other essays in the same periodical on Machiavelli, ryden, Hallam's Constitutional History, and on history general. These all displayed his remarkable breadth knowledge and his even more remarkable style.
e became the most popular contributor to the Review,
nd attracted the attention of the leading politicians nd literary men of England.

Macaulay's success as a writer, however, did not estroy his political aspirations. His great personal opularity — he was so gifted a conversa-onalist that even in the time when the art of onversation was deliberately cultivated he as courted and admired by some of the most istinguished personages in England — and his articles the Review finally won for him his opportunity. Two rticles on Mill and the Utilitarians so impressed Lord ansdowne that in 1820 he offered the author the seat Calne, a "pocket borough," with the express assurance that he had no wish to interfere with Macaulay's freedom of voting. By a strange coincidence, among the first speeches the young member made was an attack upon the very institution that made possible his own seat, the "pocket borough." The First Reform Bill was introduced on March 1, 1831, and the following night Macaulay made a speech which created a sensation. "Portions of it," Peel said, "were as beautiful as anything I have ever heard or read. It reminded one of the old times." The success of this speech determined Macaulay's active participation for the next three years in the affairs of the House. As a reward for his efforts in behalf of the Reform Bill, he was made one of the commissioners of the Board of Control, which regulated the affairs of India. Though he was now giving his evenings to the House of Commons and his days to India, he yet found time by rising at five in the morning for some literary composition. In his first two years as a member of the House he furnished the Review with eight important articles.

§ 13. His early political career

§ 14. Appointment to Supreme Council of India

While he was thus advancing his public fortunes by his administrative work, his able speaking, and his brilliant essays, the private fortunes of the Macaulay family were dwindling. His own income, derived from his office as a commissioner of the Board of Control of India and from his essays, was precarious. He could never tell when he should lose his office, and as to literature he said in 1833, "It has hitherto been my relaxation; I have never considered it as a means of support. . . . The thought of becoming a bookseller's hack, of spurring a jaded fancy to reluctant exertion, of filling sheets with trash merely that sheets may be filled, . . . is horrible to me." Thus, when he was offered a seat in the Supreme Council of India at a salary of £10,000 a year, he felt constrained to accept, or he knew he could easily save £30,000 in his five years

n office. His favorite sister, Hannah, made his accept-nce easier by consenting to accompany him. So in Feb-uary, 1834, the brother and sister set sail for Calcutta.

His career in India was notable for his efforts in es-ablishing a system of national education and in draft-ng a penal code. The latter was an ex- § 15. His work in India eedingly fine piece of work. A successor in ffice said of it : " The ' India Penal Code ' s to the English criminal law what a manufactured rticle is to the materials out of which it is made. It is o the French ' Code Pénal,' and, I may add, to the North German Code ' of 1871, what a finished picture s to a sketch. It is far simpler, and much better exressed, than Livingston's ' Code for Louisiana,' and its ractical success has been complete." It is only fair
o say, however, that the code was too theoretically ne for practical use and was not enacted until nearly wenty-five years later, after it had been considerably evised. During his arduous official labors, however, Iacaulay was not neglecting either his reading or his riting. In thirteen months he read through the reek and Latin classics, some of them twice, and connued sending articles to the Edinburgh Review. The ne on Bacon is perhaps the most striking of those ritten in India. Finally, in 1838, with enough saved
o make him independent for the rest of his life, Maaulay set sail for England.

The next eight years of his life were devoted both to olitics and to literature. Shortly after his return, he isited Italy for the first time and was, as one § 16. Politics and literature : 1839–1847 ould expect, enchanted. He took pleasure, owever, not so much in natural scenery as places memorable to him because of assical associations. While in Rome, he received n offer from Lord Melbourne of the office of Judge

Advocate, but he declined without hesitation. The salary, £2500, was now nothing to him, and the duties would interfere with his literary work. When he returned to England in 1839, he could not resist the pressure of his friends and re-entered Parliament as a member for Edinburgh. He was shortly given by Lord Melbourne a seat in the Whig Cabinet as War Secretary. During the next two years Macaulay devoted himself to his office and to the House of Commons. He nevertheless found time to write several articles for the Review, notably the one on Lord Clive. The Whigs went out of office in 1841 because of popular dissatisfaction with their handling of the Corn Law repeal. The Tories, under Sir Robert Peel, carried through the repeal of these Corn Laws, as the laws fixing a duty on the importation of grain were called, and continued in office for four years. Macaulay naturally went out with his party, not greatly to his regret, for he was anxious to resume his literary labors. He first wrote his essay on Warren Hastings, which with the one on Clive forms a wonderfully brilliant portrayal of British conquests in East India. He was exceedingly busy during the next three years ; he published one article after another in the Review ; in 1842, he published a volume of his poems, which was most enthusiastically received ; in 1843 he published, reluctantly and only because of pirated American editions, a collection of his essays. In the meantime the project for writing a history of England was growing upon him. In 1846, when the Whigs again came into power, he received in the cabinet the office of paymaster-general. His duties were very light, and his salary added £2000 a year to his income. He held this office for only a year, however, for he lost his popularity with his Edinburgh constituents and failed of re-election. He seemed indifferent to their affairs and had no sympathy with the radical lement among them. Moreover, he had lost much of is interest in politics, so absorbed was he in his history.

Macaulay retired to private life with little regret — vith considerable relief, indeed, for the History was now is dominant thought. His method of com-

§ 17. The "History"; 1847–1855

osition was exceedingly slow. Though he vorked twelve hours a day, he produced in hat time an average of only two printed ages. His care concerning details was prodigious : e visited in person nearly all the localities where the vents he narrated took place ; he ransacked all the braries, public and private, to which he could gain ccess. Thackeray said, " He reads twenty books to vrite a sentence ; he travels one hundred miles to make line of description." Moreover, he embodied in his olumes the knowledge gained from a lifetime of mnivorous reading, a knowledge that was almost ncredible in its extent and exactness. The first two olumes finally appeared in 1848. The reception of hem was most flattering, for they sold enormously ot only in Great Britain but also in America and on he Continent. His fame was now secure. He could fford to live regardless of social and political demands. When in 1852 his party returned to office, he refused a eat in the cabinet. He could not resist, however, the ompliment of an unsolicited election in Edinburgh, vith which the city tried to make amends for its shabby reatment of him in 1847. But shortly afterwards, e received a warning that if his history was to be com-leted, he could not delay — a serious ailment in his eart action arose. Though he spoke twice in Parlia-nent, he was aware that he could little afford the energy nese speeches cost him. He henceforth rarely at-ended Parliament, he almost gave up letter writing, nd he quite abandoned society. Finally, in Novem-er, 1855, volumes three and four of the History appeared. The reception of them was even warmer than it had been of the earlier ones, if that were possible. He received as royalties for one year's sale of these two volumes the sum of £20,000.

With this success, Macaulay turned to a life of quiet and leisure. He resigned his seat in Parliament to the "unfeigned sorrow" of the electors of Edinburgh. He bought the lease of Holly Lodge in Kensington. It was ideal for a bachelor of his tastes. Though the rooms were mostly small, the library was large and exceedingly pleasant, opening upon a beautiful lawn adorned with shrubs and flowers. Here he spent the remainder of his life, as happy as his illness would permit him to be. In 1857 he was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Macaulay of Rothley. He enjoyed his title, probably all the more because he must have felt it was gained neither by wealth nor by political or military service. He continued his simple life, working as best he could on the fifth volume of the History. He also succeeded in writing five articles for the Encyclopedia Britannica, that on Dr. Johnson being among them. In 1859, he managed to make a tour of the English lakes and the Highlands of Scotland. Everywhere his reception was most enthusiastic. In Edinburgh, in particular, the attentions paid him were almost embarrassing. In December he grew steadily worse. On Christmas day he said but little, and was constantly falling asleep. He died on the 28th of December, and was buried on the 9th of January, 1860, in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey, amid the tombs of Johnson and Garrick, Goldsmith and Addison.

§ 18. His last years: 1856–1859

MACAULAY THE MAN

What manner of man was this versatile genius? A great lady of England said to him in his thirty-first year, "Mr. Macaulay, you are so different to what I expected. I thought you were dark and thin, but you are fair, and, really, Mr. Macaulay, you are fat." Indeed he was never imposing in his personal appearance. His friend, Praed, the editor of Knight's Quarterly Magazine, described him as "a short manly figure, marvelously upright, with a bad neckcloth, and one hand in his waistcoat pocket. Of regular beauty he had little to boast." His nephew and biographer, Trevelyan, says of him further that he had "a massive head, and features of a powerful and rugged cast; but so constantly lighted up by every joyful and ennobling emotion that it mattered little if, when absolutely quiescent, his face was rather homely than handsome. . . . He at all times sat and stood straight, full, and square. . . . He dressed badly but not cheaply. His clothes, though all put on, were good, and his wardrobe was always enormously overstocked. Later in life he indulged himself in an apparently inexhaustible succession of handsome embroidered waistcoats, which he used to regard with much complacency. . . . When in the open air, he wore perfectly new dark kid gloves, into the fingers of which he never succeeded in inserting his own more than half way."

§ 19. Personal appearance

The description of his figure suggests that he was not devoted to athletic pursuits, and truly he was utterly lacking in physical accomplishments. He could not swim, or row, or drive, or skate, or shoot. As for riding, he was informed when in attendance at Windsor as a cabinet minister that a horse was at his disposal. "If Her Majesty wishes to see me ride," he is said to have remarked, "she must order out an elephant." His only exercise was walking. Until he was past fifty, he was always on his feet indoors and out, and thought nothing of a ten-mile walk. He had, too, the strange habit of reading as he walked, even on crowded streets.

§ 20. Habits and personality: (1) A great walker

As to his other pleasures, they were of a most simple kind. He was by nature most sociable, and always loved good companionship. As a young man, he took the keenest pleasure in the society and conversation of the famous men and women of the time. After his essay on Milton he was until his departure for India a social favorite. In particular he was a frequent guest at Holland House, where for nearly fifty years the greatest personages in England were gathered by the distinguished Lord Holland and his accomplished but eccentric wife. Upon his return from India, however, and especially after he lost his seat in 1847, he withdrew more and more from the society of the great, which was to him no longer a novelty. He still enjoyed the companionship of a dozen or so of the most eminent men in London, and he used constantly to gather a circle of them in his bachelor apartments in the Albany for a social breakfast.

§ 21. (2) His love of society

His books were an even dearer form of recreation throughout his life. The amount and character of his reading during approximately the first year of his stay in India is almost unbelievable. "During the last thirteen months I have read Aeschylus twice; Sophocles twice; Euripides once," and more than twenty-five other Greek and Latin authors, some once, some twice. Nor was his reading limited to the Greek and Latin classics. He read French, German, Italian, Spanish, Dutch, and Portuguese, most of which he taught himself by using

§ 22. (3) His love of reading

he Bible as a text-book. In English he read everything, not even excluding the most sentimental and ashy novel. He wrote to his sister Margaret from ndia, "Books are becoming everything to me. If I ad at this moment my choice of life, I would bury yself in one of those immense libraries that we saw gether at the Universities, and never pass a waking our without a book before me."

But the sweetest pleasure of all in Macaulay's life as the companionship of his sisters, Hannah and Margaret, who were respectively ten and welve years younger than he, and in is later years, of his young nephews and ieces. He was himself never married, and s far as we know, never wished to marry, for Trevelan mentions no trace of a romance in his life. When Margaret married, he was nearly broken-hearted : he ad concentrated his feelings more intensively and ore exclusively upon her and Hannah than was ood for himself. He writes : "I have still one ore stake to lose. There remains one event [the event f Hannah's marrying] for which, when it arrives, I shall, hope, be prepared. From that moment, with a heart rmed, if ever any man's heart was formed, for domestic appiness, I shall have nothing left in this world but mbition." Hannah's marriage, however, did not berive him of her companionship. She accompanied im to India, and when she shortly after met and marred a promising young Englishman, Charles Trevelyan - the father of the biographer — she and her husband ade their home with Macaulay while he remained n India. For his own father, Macaulay always had great respect and affection, but there was too uch rigidity in the older man's make-up to permit f his being the subject of such love as the sisters ceived.

§ 23. (4) His affection for his sisters

Macaulay's beautiful feeling for his sisters is quite in keeping with his character as a whole : he was generous to a fault, most strictly honorable, and above reproach in his personal life. His gifts after he became rich were often rashly generous. In his journal under the date September 14th, 1859, appears this interesting passage : " A Dr. —— called, and introduced himself as a needy man of letters. I was going to give him a sovereign, and send him away, when I discovered that he was the philologist, whom I should never have expected to see in such a plight. I felt for him, and gave him a hundred pounds." Macaulay's absolute integrity is best illustrated by his action in Parliament when he refused to acquiesce in a measure of the ministry of which he was a member. His father and sisters were largely dependent upon him at the time, and he could ill afford to lose his office. Nevertheless he placed his resignation in the hands of Lord Althorp, the prime minister, and spoke against the bill. Fortunately, the ministry came round to his view. He was therefore able to write his father : " Lord Althorp told me yesterday night that the cabinet had determined not to accept my resignation. I have therefore the singular good luck of having saved both my honor and my place, and of having given no just ground of offense either to the Abolitionists or to my party friends."

§ 24. His character : (1) Virtues, generosity and integrity

Macaulay would not have been human, however, if he had not had his faults. The outstanding one was his self-assurance. He was always perfectly sure that he was right, and never recognized the fact that there might be two sides to a question. Nor did he hesitate in any company to express his opinions vehemently. His father, having been told of this tendency, wrote to him in college, quoting from Cowper's Conversation :

§ 25. (2) Faults : (a) Self-confidence

" Ye powers who rule the tongue, if such there are,
And make colloquial happiness your care,
Preserve me from the thing I dread and hate,
A duel in the form of a debate.
Vociferated logic kills me quite.
A noisy man is always in the right."

He then went on to remonstrate at length with his son : You know how much such a quotation as this would all in with my notions — averse as I am to loud and oisy tones, and self-confident, overwhelming, and yet erhaps very unsound arguments. And you will remember how anxiously I dwelt upon this point while ou were at home. . . . I do long and pray most arnestly that the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit ay be substituted for vehemence and self-confidence, nd that you may be as much distinguished for the ormer as ever you have been in the latter. It is a chool in which I am not ambitious that any child of ine should take a high degree." Lord Melbourne ummed up admirably Macaulay's crowning weakness : I wish I were as cocksure of any one thing as Maaulay is of everything."

Hardly less striking than Macaulay's self-confidence as the influence of his prejudices upon his judgment. He seems to have found it difficult to be fair oward women. His essay on Madame D'Arblay (Frances Burney, the author of Evelina) is condescending in tone throughut ; he frequently damns with faint praise. In his Life of Johnson, Macaulay is grossly unfair both o Mrs. Johnson and to Mrs. Thrale. He speaks, with ttle justification, of the former as a " tawdry painted randmother " and of the latter as having a " base, degrading passion " for an Italian fiddler. In the light f his adoration for his sisters, it is hard to understand how he could have been so harsh in his treatment o women, unless the explanation be that his own sister were so beyond reproach that all other women seeme unworthy by comparison.

§ 26. (b) Judgment influenced by prejudices : (i) Women

Macaulay seemingly let his prejudices influence hi judgment also in the case of democratic institutions particularly those of America. Though h was liberal in his political beliefs and a firm believer in the progress of civilization, he saw in America, where the greatest progress had taken place only melancholy signs of anarchy and decay — signs portending the collapse of liberty and the triumph o ignorance and crime. He wrote to an American i 1857 his belief that when the great mass of the popu lation should actually know want, the whole fabric o the government would be rent. The demagogue woul be elected in preference to the statesman. "There wil be, I fear, spoliation. The spoliation will increase th distress; the distress will produce fresh spoliation There is nothing to stop you; your Constitution is al sail and no anchor. . . . Either civilization or liberty will perish. Either some Caesar or Napoleon wil seize the reins of government with a strong hand, o your republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the twentieth century as th Roman Empire was in the fifth." What could have le him to such a gloomy view is unimaginable, excep possibly his anger at the unauthorized editions of hi work by "enterprising Yankee publishers"; or per haps it was his irritation at the insistence of America tourists — "Yankees" was the term he always used — in invading his privacy. "I went the day befor yesterday," he wrote to Mr. Ellis, "to Grosmer Churchyard, and saw Wordsworth's tomb. I though of announcing my intention of going, and issuing guine tickets to people who wished to see me there; for

§ 27. (ii) America

Yankee who was here a few days ago, and heard that was expected, said that he would give the world to see that most sublime of all spectacles, Macaulay standing by the grave of Wordsworth." Or, more seriously, perhaps his feelings concerning democratic institutions were his natural reaction to the excesses of the French Revolution.

But the most striking case of the influence of Macaulay's prejudices is to be found in his treatment of the Whigs and the Tories. These were the names given to the two great parties in English politics from the end of the seventeenth century down to comparatively recent times. After the death of Queen Elizabeth in 1603, the Stuart line came to the English throne, James VI of Scotland becoming James I of England. The character of these rulers was such that they made staunch friends, but very bitter enemies. At first the friends of the king were called Cavaliers; his enemies were called Roundheads, because, being chiefly Puritans, they wore their hair cropped close. Later, toward the end of Charles II's reign, the adherents of the king and of his opponents began to be called respectively Tories and Whigs. It is a curious circumstance, as Macaulay points out in his History, that one of the nicknames is of Irish and the other of Scottish origin. The word tory meant originally a highwayman; it was applied to those Catholic outlaws who took refuge in the bogs of Ireland. Whig, on the other hand, is of Scotch origin; it was first used in connection with the Presbyterian zealots of Scotland who from their excesses in the opposite direction had fled to the western Lowlands. The Tory party included a very large majority of the nobles and of the wealthy gentry in the country; also the Established-Church clergy, the Universities, and all laymen who were attached to the Anglican ritual.

§ 28. (iii) Whigs and Tories

With the upper classes and the churchmen were joined two other groups : there was first a large number who made pleasure their business — artists, actors, painters, poets —, who knew that they " might thrive under a superb and luxurious despotism, but must starve under the rigid rule of the precisians " ; secondly, there were the Catholics, who to a man threw in their lot with the king's party, both because the queen, the sister of Louis XIII of France, was a Catholic and would use her no inconsiderable influence in their favor and because they knew they could expect nothing but the harshest treatment from the non-conformists. The Whig party got its main strength among the small freeholders of the country and among the merchants and shopkeepers of the towns. With these were joined a formidable minority of the nobility — all the more formidable in that they acted upon principle and not interest. There was also included the whole body of Protestant non-conformists, together with those members of the Established Church who adhered to Calvinism, a doctrine popular about forty years before, the chief tenet of which was that a man's soul is predestined by God to salvation or destruction. In the House of Commons the Whig element generally had a majority, but the House of Lords was overwhelmingly Tory.

§ 29. Macaulay the Whig

Macaulay's judgment could not escape considerable influence from the nature of his Whiggism. He was converted from Toryism while he was in college, and he remained a Whig until his death. " I entered public life a Whig," he said in 1849, " and a Whig I am determined to remain." His weakness lies not so much in the fact that he was a Whig throughout his life, but rather in that he was so dogmatic and opinionated in his Whiggism. As Trevelyan puts it, " He left college a staunch and vehement Whig, eager to maintain against all mers and at any moment that none but Whig opinions d a leg to stand upon." Such dogmatism is almost nolly irrational. It tends to question-begging, to aching a decision upon prejudice rather than upon judicial weighing of the facts. Is it any wonder, en, that Macaulay is so savage in his treatment of hn Wilson Croker, especially as concerns the latter's gnum opus, his edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson? ith all its defects the work had merits which Ma- ulay did not, or would not, see; the results of oker's researches have been of inestimable value to er editors. Nor was Macaulay in his Life of John- n less unfair to anything or anybody else Tory. If hnson took care that the Whig dogs did not get the tter of it, Macaulay certainly took care that the ory ones did not either.

ACAULAY'S POSITION IN ENGLISH LITERA- TURE

This opinionated Whig, this cocksure critic of things general, of democracy and women in particular, vertheless has no insignificant position as writer of four different forms of English erature. First as a poet he has always been mensely popular. True, he published only one small lume, his Lays of Ancient Rome, and wrote only a all number of additional poems. Yet to-day any hoolboy can quote from Horatius. This popularity to be accounted for not by the poetic genius of the iter, but rather by the stirring action of the ballads. ey are stories in rimed verse not unlike the poetry Sir Walter Scott, and they rank with Scott's as etry. Each story is told in perfectly clear language, th such vigor and enthusiasm, with so much martial rit and patriotic fervor that they could not but be popular. Yet Macaulay was not a true poet. Hi poems are not the irrepressible outbursts of enrapture genius ; they are rather the polished handiwork of skilled mechanic. They are rhetoric, not inspiration.

§ 30. As a poet

Macaulay was greater as orator than as poet. Thoug in his own day he was often called "the Burke of th age," he was far less great than his illustriou predecessor. Yet he was in a way mor effective ; for if a speech by Burke was dinner bell, a signal to clear the benches, one by Ma caulay, as Gladstone says, was a clarion call to fill them A political opponent describes picturesquely his ef fectiveness : "He is an ugly, . . . shapeless litt dumpling of a fellow, with a featureless face, too — except indeed a good expansive forehead — sleek puritanical, sandy hair, large glimmering eyes, and mouth from ear to ear. He has a lisp and a burr, more over, and speaks thickly and huskily for several minute before he gets into the swing of his discourse ; but afte that nothing can be more dazzling than his whol execution. What he says is . . . so well-worded, an so volubly and forcibly delivered — there is such a endless string of epigram and antithesis — such a flash ing of epithets — such an accumulation of images — and the voice is so trumpet-like, and the action s grotesquely emphatic that you might hear a pin dro in the House." The wealth of illustrative material of statistics, of quotations, of anecdotes, was responsibl for his effectiveness ; yet it is interesting to note that h never used notes in speaking, nor did he, as has some times been said, carefully write his speeches out before hand and memorize them. But they were neithe impromptu nor extemporaneous, as we use the word to-day. Macaulay had the unique practice of thinkin his speeches out beforehand, and then of deliverin them exactly as he had thought them out. It is tru

§ 31. As an orator

nly in this sense that " his speeches were most carefully repared, and were repeated without the loss or omission f a single word."

Macaulay would have rested his fame no more on his ratory than on his poetry ; his History he considered is magnum opus, and to the composition f it he devoted the later years of his life. What Paradise Lost was to Milton, the His-ory was to Macaulay in his own mind. Enough has een said about the composition of it ; there remains he problem of estimating the author's accomplishment s a historian. Perhaps the shortest solution is to say hat Macaulay did exactly what he set out to do : I shall not be satisfied unless I produce something hich shall for a few days supersede the last fashion-ble novel on the table of young ladies." As he be-eved history should be made, he made it : " It should nvest with the reality of human flesh and blood beings hom we are too much inclined to consider as personi-ed qualities in an allegory ; call up our ancestors be-ore us with all their peculiarities of language, manners, nd garb ; show us over their houses, seat us at their ables, rummage their old-fashioned wardrobes, ex-lain the uses of their ponderous furniture." He may ave allowed his prejudices to influence his judgment ; e may have painted his pictures too much in black nd white ; he may have sacrificed general effect to vid particulars ; he may have thought of the end of story as being interest first and accuracy second ; et in his own field he stands supreme — the " Titian word painting." A great historical painter of the alistic school, his pictures have never been surpassed r vividness. The famous chapter describing England the second half of the seventeenth century, the illiant thirty pages (over which he spent three weeks) arrating the massacre of Glencoe are without parallel in English literature. As a painter who made his figures stand out on the historical canvas with unique vividness, Macaulay cannot fail to be ranked a true master of historical composition.

§ 32. As historian

To mention Macaulay's essays after such a series of superlatives concerning his history may seem in the nature of an anticlimax. Yet his essays, and one of them in particular, are, it is needless to say, our chief concern in this little book. Nor, indeed, was Macaulay less great as essayist than as historian in so far as essay writing includes the delineation of character and the narration of events; in fairness of criticism, however, and in accuracy of judgment he is lacking.

§ 33. As essayist

He recognized his own limitations as a critic; for in a letter to Napier, editor of the Edinburgh Review after Jeffrey, he said: "I am not successful in analyzing the effect of works of genius. I have written several things on historical, political, and moral questions, of which, on the fullest consideration, I am not ashamed, and by which I should be willing to be estimated; but I have never written a page of criticism on poetry, or the fine arts, which I would not burn if I had the power. Hazlitt used to say of himself, 'I am nothing if not critical.' The case with me is directly the reverse. I have a strong and acute enjoyment of works of the imagination, but I have never habituated myself to dissect them. Perhaps I enjoy them the more keenly for that very reason. Such books as Lessing's Laocoön,[1] such passages as the criticism on Hamlet in Wilhelm

§ 34. (1) Lack of critical ability

[1] Lessing was a German critic and dramatist of the eighteenth century. His Laocoön is a classic, not only in German but in European literature; in it he defined by analysis the limitations of poetry, sculpture and painting

eister,[1] fill me with wonder and despair." But Macaulay was not quite right as to the cause of this defect. critical and analytical power. His memory and his nnivorous reading were the two elements unfavorable the development of the reasoning faculty. His emory enabled him to save himself the trouble of asoning. He says the evident thing and emphasizes s truism by a mass of illustrations. He observes that unyan's Pilgrim's Progress is an allegory as vivid as concrete history — not an obscure or unrecognized ct. He then illustrates by pointing out that the al of Christian and Faithful is meant merely as a tire upon the judges in Charles II's time. Surely at is not criticism of the highest order.

A second weakness in Macaulay's power as an essayist to be found in his tendency to exaggerate. Though is hardly fair to say that he would rather ake an impression than tell the truth — r his assured integrity raises him above y such suspicion —, nevertheless he so had e habit of picturing things vividly that he believed s impression to be the right one. What he subnsciously desired to be true, instantaneously became ue in his own mind. Once more, he can most effctively be made his own critic — this time unconously, for the words he used were in a letter to apier in criticism of Lord Brougham, his chief rival as ntributor to the Edinburgh Review ; they are exactly plicable to Macaulay himself except for a few exgerated details : " His [Brougham's] late articles, rticularly the long one in the April number, have very

§ 35. (2) Tendency to exaggerate

[1] Goethe (1749–1832) was the Shakespeare of Germany ; his lhelm Meister was a novel which like Hugo's Les Miserables even greater for its digressions, such as its flashes of intuitive icism, than for its story.

high merit. They are, indeed, models of magazine writing as distinguished from other sorts of writing. They are not, I think, made for duration. Every thing about them is exaggerated, incorrect, sketchy. All the characters are either too black or too fair. The passions of the writer do not suffer him even to maintain the decent appearance of impartiality and the style, though striking and animated, will not bear examination through a single paragraph. But the effect of the first perusal is great ; and few people read an article in a review twice. A bold, dashing, scene-painting manner is that which always succeeds best in periodical writing ; and I have no doubt that these lively and vigorous papers of Lord Brougham will be of more use to you than more highly finished compositions." There is evidence, furthermore, that Macaulay suspected his own periodical writing of having these very faults. In another letter to Napier, he says : "The public judges, and ought to judge, indulgently of periodical works. They are not expected to be highly finished. Their natural life is only six weeks. Sometimes their writer is at a distance from the books to which he wants to refer. Sometimes he is forced to hurry through his task in order to catch the post. He may blunder ; he may contradict himself ; he may break off in the middle of a story ; he may give an immoderate extension to one part of his subject, and dismiss an equally important part in a few words. All this is readily forgiven if there be a certain spirit and vivacity in his style." Upon analysis, however, this explanation will be found to be merely an admission of a fault and an apology for it rather than a justification of it. And what is to be said concerning the Life of Johnson and the four other essays which appeared in the Encyclopedia Britannica? They may not be so full of superlatives and prejudice as were

s early essays, but they are certainly not free from ese fault.

With their defects of substance, why are the essays popular? The explanation is not far to seek; it s in Macaulay's inimitable style — a style distinctive that the adjective Macaulayan s just as definite a meaning to the educated rson as have Addisonian, Johnsonian, and iltonic; a style so striking that the early editor of the dinburgh Review, Jeffrey, could write to him, "The ore I think, the less I can conceive where you picked that style."

§ 36. Merit of essays in style

MACAULAY'S STYLE

Of course this striking style was not peculiar to the says: it is markedly noticeable in the History; it the secret of his effectiveness as an orator; it is en the distinguishing quality of his poetry. And at are the elements that make this marvelous style famous? They are just two: a clearness, a lucidity, at makes it possible for him that runs to read; a reibleness, an effectiveness, that made the Edinburgh eview sell or fail to sell according to whether there was was not an article in it by Macaulay. The arness of Macaulay's style was due to the exssive care he took in composition and revision. In ite of his protestations that his periodical says were not highly finished, he had rtain standards that he could not bring nself to neglect. The clearness of his style is to be en first in the structure of his essays. He had deloped to a high degree the faculty of organizing his aterials. He was able to see things in the right prortions, and to show them in their right relationship. s mind was orderly, and the production of it was derly. His essays have been compared to watches, for they may be taken apart and put together, so carefully are they constructed. Any schoolboy will admit the orderly structure of the Life of Johnson.

§ 37. Clearness

His paragraphs, for instance, were models of unity and coherence. He had the knack of using what are technically called transitional topic sentences. For instance, there is the paragraph beginning, "While leading this miserable and vagrant life, Johnson fell in love." The paragraph tells of his love for Mrs. Elizabeth Porter; the preceding one, of course, tells of his early struggles. By beginning his paragraphs with a sentence expressing the topic of the whole paragraph and by having every other sentence develop this topic, he was able to make of each paragraph a perfect unit.

His sentences, too, are almost monotonously and mechanically perfect. He seems to have had an aversion for pronouns; fearing that the reference of the hims, hers, and its might be ambiguous, he did not hesitate to repeat a whole group of substantives. Again he would repeat a whole statement, merely to be sure that the sense was unmistakable. He avoided sentences the least bit involved in structure. He hated parentheses and qualifications, and preferred to express a subsidiary statement as a simple proposition, rather than to attach it as a subordinate clause to a main statement. His system was so effective that a reader at the publishing house printing his History could say there was in a whole volume only one sentence the meaning of which was not obvious at first sight.

§ 38. Force: (1) By concreteness

The force of Macaulay's style was responsible even more than its clearness for the popularity of his works, the word force being used in its technical sense to mean interest, effectiveness, "the distinguishing quality of a style that holds the attention." The secret of his force lay in the use of concrete details and in the mastery of several etorical devices. The classic illustration of the power the concrete to hold the attention is the definition a philosopher : put abstractly, the philosopher is e who deals with the abstract ; put concretely, the ilosopher may be defined as a blind man in a dark llar looking for a black cat that is not there. Two ntences from the paragraph concerning his love for rs. Porter will illustrate his use of concrete details : To ordinary spectators, the lady appeared to be a ort, fat, coarse woman, painted half an inch thick, essed in gaudy colors, and fond of exhibiting pro- ncial airs and graces which were not exactly those the Queensberrys and Lepels. To Johnson, how- er, whose passions were strong, whose eye-sight was o weak to distinguish ceruse from natural bloom, and no had seldom or never been in the same room with a oman of real fashion, his Titty, as he called her, was e most beautiful, graceful, and accomplished of her x."

The other source of Macaulay's effectiveness of style y in his mastery of several rhetorical devices, notably e periodic sentence and the principle of lance. The periodic sentence, as dis- guished from the loose sentence, is one in ich the sense is suspended until the end. rrett Wendell sums up (from Herbert encer's Philosophy of Style) the greater ectiveness of the periodic sentence : "In a loose rle, the mind of the reader tends constantly to pause, grasp the complete idea, at each point where the ase is grammatically complete ; and each added use involves not only the addition of some new tures to an idea that one is tempted to consider com- te without them, but often also the unmaking of an a into which the logically incomplete if gram- atically complete statements of the earlier portions of the sentence have led us." Is not this explanation a perfect example of the very weakness of the loose sentence? There are at least four possible stopping places; each time that we are forced to go on, the thought becomes a little less distinct in our minds. The periodic sentence on the contrary, by holding our attention in suspense, gives up, when at the end the sense is complete, a most distinct, a much more forcible, impression. Barrett Wendell illustrates Macaulay's periodicity by a few sentences from the essay on Warren Hastings:

§ 39. (2) By rhetorical devices : (a) The periodic sentence

"With all his faults — and they were neither few nor small — only one cemetery was worthy to contain his remains. In that temple of silence and reconciliation where the enmities of twenty generations lie buried, in the great abbey which has during many ages afforded a quiet resting place to those whose minds and bodies have been shattered by the contentions of the Great Hall, the dust of the illustrious accused should have mingled with the dust of the illustrious accusers. This was not to be. Yet the place of interment was not ill chosen. Behind the chancel of the parish church of Daylesford, in earth which already held the bones of many chiefs of the house of Hastings, was laid the coffin of the greatest man who has ever borne that ancient and widely extended name."

The above passage is given at length because it illustrates besides Macaulay's periodicity his use of balance in thought and in expression. He was never satisfied with one word, phrase, clause, or sentence if he could think of a fitting companion for it. In his article on the Diary and Letters of Madame D'Arblay, he says: "Take a single example, Shylock. Is he so eager for money as to be indifferent to revenge? Or so eager for revenge as to be indifferent to money? Or so bent on both

§ 40. (b) The principle of balance

gether as to be indifferent to the honor of the nation d the law of Moses? . . . A superficial critic might y that hatred is Shylock's ruling passion. But how ny passions have amalgamated to form that hatred?
is partly the result of wounded pride: Antonio has led him dog. It is partly the result of covetousness:
tonio has hindered him of half a million. . . . It is rtly the result of national and religious feeling:
tonio has spit on the Jewish gaberdine." But Maulay's most famous use of balance is in his early position of Boswell as biographer: "But these men ained literary eminence in spite of their weaknesses.
swell attained it by reason of his weaknesses," and on.[1] Artificial this excessive use of balance is with-a doubt; but the Victorians were nothing if not -conscious.

§ 41. Macaulay and Johnson compared

By Macaulay's favorite principle of balance, by a nparison of him with Johnson, an effective summary his life and work may be made. The "eminent subject" of the model essay and writer of that essay are markedly alike many respects. Both were extremely cocious; both were omnivorous readers; both had narkable memories; both were distinguished for ir conversational powers; both delighted in good npanionship; both were strong partisans, though one was an ardent Tory and the other as strong Whig; both were of irreproachable moral character. t in one material respect the two men were unlike: acaulay was as much favored by fortune as Johnson s buffeted by it. Johnson had to face nearly all the stacles nature and chance could offer — a chronic ease, an ungainly body, great privations, and few portunities for the display of his ability. Macaulay was in truth a "favorite of the gods" — with splendid health, judicious parents, instantaneous success in all that he undertook, and limitless opportunities for the exercise of his powers.

[1] See § 49 below.

MACAULAY ON JOHNSON

§ 42. Macaulay's earlier essay on Johnson

Macaulay wrote two essays on Johnson, a review of Croker's edition of Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson, and twenty-five years later a biography of Johnson for the Encyclopedia Britannica. The early essay, published in 1831 in the Edinburgh Review, shows Macaulay's artificiality of style at its worst. He admittedly was influenced by his feelings for Croker, a bitter political enemy. "See whether I do not dust that varlet's jacket for him in the next number of the 'Blue and Yellow.' I detest him more than cold boiled veal," he wrote his sister. Moreover, the subject itself, Boswell and Johnson, was a tempting one for flashy treatment. Finally, the author's style was at the very peak of its youthful exuberance. This exuberance he tried to justify in a most remarkable letter to the editor of the Edinburgh Review objecting to the omission of certain passages in one of his articles: "The passages omitted were the most pointed and ornamented in the whole review. Now, for high and grave works, a history for example, or a system of political or moral philosophy, Dr. Johnson's rule — that every sentence which the writer thinks fine ought to be cut out — is excellent. But periodical works like ours, which, unless they strike at the first reading, are not likely to strike at all, whose whole life is a month or two, may I think be allowed to be sometimes even viciously florid. Probably in estimation the real value of any tinsel which I may put upon my articles, you and I should t materially differ. But it is not by his own taste, t by the taste of the fish, that the angler is determined his choice of bait." In his review of Croker's book, acaulay practised to the utmost the theory he eached so frankly to his editor.

The Life of Johnson is very much better in subject atter and in style than the earlier essay. In the enty-five years that had passed since 1831, acaulay's style had lost some of its exuber- ce, and his judgment had become a little s clouded by prejudice. When he first blished his essays in collected form (1843), had to admit that he read few of them h satisfaction. He was right in thinking, wever, that the best were the latest : "The most stile critic must admit, I think, that I have im- oved greatly as a writer. The third volume seems me worth two of the second, and the second worth of the first." Moreover, this later essay on John- was not written for a periodical but for a reference rk, the Encyclopedia Britannica. The author was erefore not so strongly under the necessity of writing a "catchy style." He took infinite pains with all biographies he wrote for the Britannica, the one on t being in preparation for nine months. Trevelyan ls the Life of Johnson "a model of that which its inent subject pronounced to be the essential qualifi- ion of a biographer — the art of writing trifles with nity."

§ 43. The "Life of Johnson" compared with the "Review of Croker's Boswell"

Macaulay's primary purpose in this model essay is give us information concerning Johnson's life and rks, but underlying this purpose there is secondary motive, the presentation of a me, a unifying thread running through whole essay. Most formal essays have an incidental or hidden purpose some central truth.

§ 44. Theme of "Life of Johnson"

In the Life of Johnson this theme is stated in the very first paragraph : " But the force of his mind overcame every impediment." Throughout the essay we find impediments multiplied, exaggerated, but we always find Johnson overcoming these impediments, be they indolence, procrastination, disease, eccentricities, or the state of letters in London at the time. Sometimes, indeed, Macaulay states or implies that Johnson wielded the influence he had, because of and not in spite of his eccentricities. In paragraph 40 he says, " Even the peculiarities which seemed to unfit him for civilized society . . . increased the interest which his new associates, the Thrales, took in him." But this exception was more apparent than real, for it is stated that in any one but a man of genius, " such oddities would have excited only disgust." In other words the Thrales were all the more interested because these eccentricities showed what obstacles Johnson had been obliged to surmount. Besides the obstacles inherent in Johnson, Macaulay paints most vividly that obstacle encountered in the low state of letters in London at the time. It is typical of Macaulay, however, to neglect the deeper matters, the causes, for instance, of this low state of letters. It is impossible to understand Johnson's difficulties or his life in London unless one knows what life in general in London was like in his day.

JOHNSON'S LONDON AND ITS INFLUENCE UPON HIM

About the best thing that can be said of life in London in Johnson's time is that it had improved considerably since the generation of Addison and Steele. When Johnson reached London in 1737, Queen Anne had been dead twenty-three years, and the last Spectator had een printed an equal number of years. Though the ssential characteristics of the period to which the ame of the "stupid and meek" Queen is ven remained, the efforts of Addison and teele "to expose the fake arts of life, to ull off the disguises of cunning, vanity, and ffectation, and to recommend a general simplicity in ur dress, our discourse, and our behavior" had not een altogether in vain. Many of the worst barbarisms f the preceding generation seem to have disappeared. Ve hear nothing now of the Mohocks (Mohawks), oving bands of rowdies — often young men of wealth nd supposedly good breeding — who made life in ondon at night unsafe with their pranks. Johnson imself is witness to some improvement: "In the st age, when my mother lived in London, there were vo sets of people, those who gave the wall, and those ho took it: the peaceable and the quarrelsome. Vhen I returned to Lichfield, after having been in ondon, my mother asked me whether I was one of ose who gave the wall, or those that took it. Now is fixed that every man keeps to the right; or if e is taking the wall, another yields it; and it is ever a dispute." But the social life does not seem to ave changed considerably. The two thousand odd ublic coffee-houses were, it is true, waning in popu- rity; the inns and taverns were beginning to take eir place. Johnson's favorite resort was the Mitre avern, and he once remarked "there is nothing which as yet been contrived by man, by which so much appiness is produced as by a good tavern or inn." ut in spite of the tendency of the tavern to substitute ppling for talking, conversation was still truly an art. erhaps, indeed, it reached its very climax in Johnson imself. It is not an implausible guess that the very eason for the low state of letters — for literature's not having "begun to flourish under the patronage of the public" — was that the gentlemen of the time preferred to talk about books than to buy and read them.

§ 45. Life in London in Johnson's time

An explanation of the fact that "literature had ceased to flourish under the patronage of the great" is to be found in the changed political conditions. The earlier generation of politicians had found the support of able writers necessary to their success. The strife between Whigs and Tories was intense, and each party found it expedient to use the great writers to advance its own interests and to satirize its enemies. Addison's rapid rise was due to the ability with which he supported the Whig cause, and in particular to his poem, The Campaign, written to order to commemorate the victory of the great Whig General, Marlborough, at Blenheim. When Johnson went to London in 1737, Robert Walpole was in the midst of his long domination of English politics. Walpole was not dependent upon literary men or pamphleteers. He used other means to get and hold his power. Parliamentary support could be bought by places and pensions, and even by hard cash. As for the support of the country at large, he had nothing to worry about so long as the country maintained its prosperity, for the Tories were hopelessly divided over the Jacobitic designs of one faction. Moreover, Walpole "was ignorant of books and loved neither writing nor reading, and if he had a taste for art his real love was for the table, the bottle and the chase." Is it any wonder, then, that between the public's preference for talking over reading, and the failure of the great to need or desire the support of writers, the position of a man of letters in Johnson's time was difficult?

§ 46. Political conditions

To certain peculiarities of taste in this age are to be buted most of Johnson's defects as a critic. The uence of Addison and Steele, and the multiplica- n of clubs and coffee-houses, with the velopment of tolerance and better man- s in social life, resulted in a kind of super- al elegance showing itself in both prose and poetry. e age extended from the English Revolution in 1688 he beginning of the French Revolution in 1789 ; it ne to be called by the writers themselves the Au- tan Age, because they thought it to be distinguished the refinement of taste characterizing the reign of peror Augustus. They believed Pope, Addison, ft, and Johnson to be the modern parallels of race, Cicero, Ovid, and Vergil. The term classic, vever, is more commonly used, for its modern con- ation is more accurately applicable. It suggests d adherence to classical rules, and emphasis upon n, sometimes at the expense of content. It is to contrasted with romantic, which suggests an ignoring rules and conventions, and emphasis upon spon- eity and individuality. The Classic Age was an of revolt against the fantastic style of the writers the Restoration. The critics of the Classic Age nanded that poetry should follow exact rules, es- ially such rules as they professed to find in writers Aristotle and Horace. Dryden established the oic couplet, and it became the standard poetic form der Pope's perfecting hand. Johnson, who fol- ed these two as the third literary dictator of Classic- , was compelled to defend Classicism in general and heroic couplet in particular. The true Classicism ded to become a kind of pseudoclassicism, the writers vhich strove to repress all natural feelings and en- siasm, and to develop a kind of elegant formalism. ohnson could not see this evil tendency ; he could and appreciate only the classical tastes of the past.

§ 47. Literary tastes

He was, for instance, unable to appreciate origina works of imagination : he abhorred Milton's Puritanism and stoutly maintained the superiority o rime over blank verse ; he preferred the sen timental grandiloquence and conventiona moralizing of Richardson's Pamela to th vigorous realism of Fielding's Tom Jones ; he though Gray, one of the first of the new Romantic school, a inferior poet, and said of his odes, " They are force plants, raised in a hotbed ; and they are but poo plants ; they are but cucumbers after all." The trut is that Johnson was no judge of composition no fashioned according to the principles of the classi school. Fortunately for him, his fame does not res upon his critical ability.

§ 48. Johnson's defects as a critic

BOSWELL AS BIOGRAPHER

Macaulay would have us believe that Johnson's fam rests not upon what Johnson himself wrote but upo what Boswell wrote about him. " Boswell' book has done for him more than the bes of his own books could do ;" yet to-da few read even Boswell, and all know John son. The memorable life, " the greatest biography ever written," " the best book in the world," is read b surprisingly few. It seems to be joining Milton' Paradise Lost as a good book to know something abou and to pass by unread. The truth is that for on reader of Boswell's book there are one hundred reader of Macaulay's essay. It is therefore not far wrong t say that if in Macaulay's time Johnson's fame reste not on what he himself wrote but on what Boswel wrote about him, now in our time Johnson's fame rest neither on what he himself wrote nor on what Boswel wrote about him, but on what Macaulay wrote abou hat Boswell wrote about him — a third-hand fame,) less.

§ 49. Johnson's fame to-day

What kind of a man was this Boswell, who had the)nor of passing on to Macaulay the keeping alive of the ost vivid personality in English literature? Macaulay describes the little Scotchman in) flattering terms in the Review of Croker's dition — and at the same time admits his re-eminence as a biographer. "Homer is)t more decidedly the first of heroic poets, Shake-)eare is not more decidedly the first of dramatists, emosthenes is not more decidedly the first of orators, an Boswell is the first of biographers. He has no cond. . . . Many of the greatest men that ever lived ave written biography. Boswell was one of the small- t men that ever lived, and he has beaten them all. e was . . . a man of the meanest and feeblest in- llect. . . . He was the laughing stock of the whole that brilliant society which has owed to him the eater part of its fame. He was always laying himself the feet of some eminent man, and begging to be it upon and trampled upon. . . . Servile and im- rtinent, shallow and pedantic, a bigot and sot, oated with family pride, and eternally blustering)out the dignity of a born gentleman, yet stooping to a talebearer, an eavesdropper, a common butt in e taverns of London — such was this man, and such was content and proud to be." "[Most men] at- ined literary eminence in spite of their weaknesses.)swell attained it by reason of his weaknesses. If had not been a great fool, he would never have been great writer. Without all the qualities which made m the jest and the torment of those among whom he ed, without the officiousness, the inquisitiveness, the rontery, toad-eating, the insensibility to all reproof, never could have produced so excellent a book."

§ 50. Boswell as biographer: according to Macaulay

As with all of Macaulay's exaggerations, there wa yet a germ of truth beneath all the epithets. Thi

§ 51. The true Boswell

James Boswell was an extraordinary figure — "a shallow little Scotch barrister" whos whole ambition was to shine in the reflecte glory of great men. He was of good family, his fathe being elevated to the supreme court of Scotland wit the title of Lord Auchincleck. Boswell himself wa trained for the law, but early recognized his true voca tion. By the time he reached his majority, he ha begun to Boswellize, to attach himself to every celebrit that came within his ken. Finally, in 1763, he met fo the first time (in the back shop of Tom Davie's, bookseller of Covent Garden) the great man of hi dreams, Dictionary Johnson, and was severely snubbe by him — except that Boswell could not be snubbed Boswell was at the time twenty-three, while Johnso was fifty-four. For the remainder of his life, Boswell' excuse for existence was to draw forth, record, an interpret the dicta of his idol. He survived Johnso only eleven years, and those years he devoted to hi great work, The Life of Samuel Johnson. Macaula was not the first to offer the theory that Boswell wrot a great book because he was a great fool and not in spit of it. The poet Gray had in Boswell's own lifetim said, "Any fool may write a valuable book by chance.' The truth is, however, that Boswell was a biographica genius. He was able to give an extraordinary lifelike ness to his pictures; his retentiveness and accuracy especially in reporting conversations, is remarkable his power of observation in matters of dress, actions and character is surprising; his very "naif and im perturbable persistency, . . . and even the abnega tion of all personal dignity" all show his genius. I was this last characteristic, his persistency in word an deed, that gave Macaulay an excuse for the epithets h

sed. "Who is this Scotch cur at Johnson's heels?" me one asked. "He is not a cur," Goldsmith replied; he is only a bur." The better we know this bur, this ur, this dunce, this parasite, this coxcomb, the more spect we have for his ability and the more surely we ppreciate the justice of his being called the prince of iographers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. Macaulay

1. The standard edition of Macaulay's is that edited y his sister, Lady Trevelyan, the mother of his bi- grapher. It is in eight volumes published by Harper's America.

2. The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay, by his ephew, Sir George Otto Trevelyan, is the best bi- graphy of Macaulay and one of the best biographies English; it was published by Harper's in America 1876 and in a new edition in two volumes in 1908.

3. The Life of Macaulay in the English Men of etters series is by J. Cotter Morison; it is much iefer than Trevelyan's but excellent of its kind.

4. Innumerable good essays have been published. mong them are Mark Pattison's in the Encyclopedia ritannica; Saintsbury's in The Cambridge History English Literature; Leslie Stephen's in the Dic- ionary of National Biography and in Hours in a ibrary; John Morley's in Critical Miscellanies; Walter Bagehot's in Literary Studies. The best general scussion of Macaulay's style is probably that in Minto's English Prose Writers.

B. Johnson

1. To give a comprehensive bibliography of Johnso would require a large volume in itself. The standar work upon Johnson's life is, of course, Boswell's Lif The edition by G. Birkbeck Hill, Clarendon, six vol umes, is the best.

2. Mrs. Piozzi's Anecdotes and Letters are helpfu adjuncts to Boswell, as is Hawkins's Life of Johnson.

3. The best recent short life is that by Leslie Stephe in the English Men of Letters series.

4. The essays are innumerable. Worthy of specia mention beside Macaulay's Review of Croker's Editio and Carlyle's Essay on Croker's Boswell are the one b Leslie Stephen in Hours in a Library, Vol. II, and th one by Gosse in 18th Century Literature.

5. Among the most interesting recent books con taining essays upon Johnson and his circle are A. E Newton's Amenities of Book Collecting (Atlantic) an C. B. Tinker's The Salon and English Letters (Mac millan, 1915).

C. Boswell

1. Far and away the best book about Boswell i C. B. Tinker's Young Boswell (Atlantic Monthly Press 1922).

THE LIFE OF SAMUEL JOHNSON

1709–1784

1. Samuel Johnson, one of the most eminent nglish writers of the eighteenth century, was the son Michael Johnson, who was, at the beginning of that ntury, a magistrate of Lichfield, and a bookseller of eat note in the midland counties. Michael's abilities nd attainments seem to have been considerable. He as so well acquainted with the contents of the vol- nes which he exposed to sale, that the country rectors Staffordshire and Worcestershire thought him an acle on points of learning. Between him and the ergy, indeed, there was a strong religious and political mpathy. He was a zealous churchman, and, though e had qualified himself for municipal office by taking ne oaths to the sovereigns in possession, was to the last Jacobite in heart. At his house, a house which is still ointed out to every traveller who visits Lichfield, amuel was born on the 18th of September, 1709. In ne child, the physical, intellectual, and moral pe- uliarities which afterwards distinguished the man were ainly discernible, — great muscular strength, accom- anied by much awkwardness and many infirmities ; reat quickness of parts, with a morbid propensity to sloth and procrastination ; a kind and generous heart with a gloomy and irritable temper. He had inherited from his ancestors a scrofulous taint, which it was beyond the power of medicine to remove. His parents were weak enough to believe that the royal touch was a specific for this malady. In his third year he was taken up to London, inspected by the court surgeon, prayed over by the court chaplains, and stroked and presented with a piece of gold by Queen Anne. One of his earliest recollections was that of a stately lady in a diamond stomacher and a long black hood. Her hand was applied in vain. The boy's features, which were originally noble and not irregular, were distorted by his malady. His cheeks were deeply scarred. He lost for a time the sight of one eye ; and he saw but very imperfectly with the other. But the force of his mind overcame every impediment. Indolent as he was, he acquired knowledge with such ease and rapidity that at every school to which he was sent he was soon the best scholar. From sixteen to eighteen he resided at home, and was left to his own devices. He learned much at this time, though his studies were without guidance and without plan. He ransacked his father's shelves, dipped into a multitude of books, read what was interesting, and passed over what was dull. An ordinary lad would have acquired little or no useful knowledge in such a way ; but much that was dull to ordinary lads was interesting to Samuel. He read little Greek, for his proficiency in that language was not such that he could take much pleasure in the masters of Attic poetry and eloquence. But he had left school a good Latinist, and he soon acquired, in the large and miscellaneous library of which he now had the command, an extensive knowledge of Latin literature. That Augustan delicacy of taste, which is the boast of the great public schools of England, he never possessed. But he was early familiar with some classical writers, who were quite unknown to the best scholars in the sixth form at Eton. He was peculiarly attracted by the works of the great restorers of learning. Once, while searching for some apples, he found a huge folio volume of Petrarch's works. The name excited his curiosity, and he eagerly devoured hundreds of pages. Indeed, the diction and versification of his own Latin compositions show that he had paid at least as much attention to modern copies from the antique as to the original models.

BIRTHPLACE AND STATUE OF DR. JOHNSON NEAR LICHFIELD

2. While he was thus irregularly educating himself his family was sinking into hopeless poverty. Old Michael Johnson was much better qualified to pore upon books, and to talk about them, than to trade in them. His business declined; his debts increased; it was with difficulty that the daily expenses of his household were defrayed. It was out of his power to support his son at either university, but a wealthy neighbor offered assistance; and, in reliance on promises which proved to be of very little value, Samuel was entered at Pembroke College, Oxford. When the young scholar presented himself to the rulers of that society, they were amazed not more by his ungainly figure and eccentric manners than by the quantity of ensive and curious information which he had ked up during many months of desultory but t unprofitable study. On the first day of his idence, he surprised his teachers by quoting Macro- is ; and one of the most learned among them de- red that he had never known a freshman of equal ainments.

3. At Oxford, Johnson resided during about three ars. He was poor, even to raggedness ; and his ap- arance excited a mirth and a pity which were equally olerable to his haughty spirit. He was driven from e quadrangle of Christ Church by the sneering looks ich the members of that aristocratical society cast the holes in his shoes. Some charitable person ced a new pair at his door ; but he spurned them ay in a fury. Distress made him, not servile, but kless and ungovernable. No opulent gentleman mmoner, panting for one-and-twenty, could have ated the academical authorities with more gross respect. The needy scholar was generally to be n under the gate of Pembroke, a gate now adorned h his effigy, haranguing a circle of lads, over whom, spite of his tattered gown and dirty linen, his wit and dacity gave him an undisputed ascendency. In ry mutiny against the discipline of the college he s the ringleader. Much was pardoned, however, to outh so highly distinguished by abilities and ac- rements. He had early made himself known by ning Pope's "Messiah" into Latin verse. The e and rhythm, indeed, were not exactly Virgilian ;

but the translation found many admirers, and was rea with pleasure by Pope himself.

4. The time drew near at which Johnson woul in the ordinary course of things, have become a Bachel of Arts ; but he was at the end of his resources. Thos promises of support on which he had relied had not bee kept. His family could do nothing for him. His deb to Oxford tradesmen were small indeed, yet larger tha he could pay. In the autumn of 1731 he was unde the necessity of quitting the university without a d gree. In the following winter his father died. Th old man left but a pittance ; and of that pittance almo the whole was appropriated to the support of his widow The property to which Samuel succeeded amounted t no more than twenty pounds.

5. His life, during the thirty years which followe was one hard struggle with poverty. The misery c that struggle needed no aggravation, but was aggra vated by the sufferings of an unsound body and an un sound mind. Before the young man left the un versity, his hereditary malady had broken forth in singularly cruel form. He had become an incurabl hypochondriac. He said long after that he had bee mad all his life, or at least not perfectly sane ; and, i truth, eccentricities less strange than his have ofte been thought grounds sufficient for absolving felons and for setting aside wills. His grimaces, his gestures his mutterings, sometimes diverted and sometime terrified people who did not know him. At a dinner table he would, in a fit of absence, stoop down and itch off a lady's shoe. He would amaze a drawingom by suddenly ejaculating a clause of the Lord's ayer. He would conceive an unintelligible aversion a particular alley, and perform a great circuit rather an see the hateful place. He would set his heart on uching every post in the streets through which he lked. If by any chance he missed a post, he would back a hundred yards and repair the omission.

der the influence of his disease his senses became rbidly torpid, and his imagination morbidly active.
one time he would stand poring on the town clock hout being able to tell the hour. At another, he uld distinctly hear his mother, who was many miles calling him by his name. But this was not the rst. A deep melancholy took possession of him, and ve a dark tinge to all his views of human nature and human destiny. Such wretchedness as he endured has ven many men to shoot themselves or drown them-
ves. But he was under no temptation to commit sui-
e. He was sick of life ; but he was afraid of death ;
d he shuddered at every sight or sound which reminded n of the inevitable hour. In religion he found but little nfort during his long and frequent fits of dejection ;
his religion partook of his own character. The light
m heaven shone on him indeed, but not in a direct line, with its own pure splendor. The rays had to struggle ough a disturbing medium : they reached him rected, dulled, and discolored by the thick gloom which d settled on his soul, and, though they might be suffi-ntly clear to guide him, were too dim to cheer him.

6. With such infirmities of body and of mind, th celebrated man was left, at two-and-twenty, to fig his way through the world. He remained during abo five years in the midland counties. At Lichfield, h birthplace and his early home, he had inherited so friends, and acquired others. He was kindly noticed Henry Hervey, a gay officer of noble family, who ha pened to be quartered there. Gilbert Walmesle registrar of the ecclesiastical court of the diocese, a m of distinguished parts, learning, and knowledge of t world, did himself honor by patronizing the you adventurer, whose repulsive person, unpolished ma
ners, and squalid garb, moved many of the petty ar tocracy of the neighborhood to laughter or to disgu
At Lichfield, however, Johnson could find no way earning a livelihood. He became usher of a gramm school in Leicestershire ; he resided as a humble co panion in the house of a country gentleman ; but life of dependence was insupportable to his haugh spirit. He repaired to Birmingham, and there earn a few guineas by literary drudgery. In that town printed a translation, little noticed at the time, a long forgotten, of a Latin book about Abyssinia.
then put forth proposals for publishing by subscripti
the poems of Politian, with notes containing a histo of modern Latin verse ; but subscriptions did not co in, and the volume never appeared.

7. While leading this vagrant and miserable li Johnson fell in love. The object of his passion w
Mrs. Elizabeth Porter, a widow who had children

ld as himself. To ordinary spectators, the lady ap-eared to be a short, fat, coarse woman, painted half n inch thick, dressed in gaudy colors, and fond of ex-ibiting provincial airs and graces which were not xactly those of the Queensberrys and Lepels. To ohnson, however, whose passions were strong, whose yesight was too weak to distinguish ceruse from atural bloom, and who had seldom or never been n the same room with a woman of real fashion, his ’itty, as he called her, was the most beautiful, graceful, nd accomplished of her sex. That his admiration was nfeigned cannot be doubted ; for she was as poor as imself. She accepted, with a readiness which did her ttle honor, the addresses of a suitor who might have een her son. The marriage, however, in spite of occa-onal wranglings, proved happier than might have een expected. The lover continued to be under the lusions of the wedding-day till the lady died in her xty-fourth year. On her monument he placed an nscription extolling the charms of her person and of her nanners ; and when, long after her decease, he had ccasion to mention her, he exclaimed, with a tender-ess half ludicrous, half pathetic, “ Pretty creature ! ”

8. His marriage made it necessary for him to exert imself more strenuously than he had hitherto done. Ie took a house in the nighborhood of his native town, nd advertised for pupils. But eighteen months passed way, and only three pupils came to his academy. In-eed, his appearance was so strange, and his temper so iolent, that his schoolroom must have resembled an ogre's den. Nor was the tawdry, painted grand mother whom he called his Titty, well qualified t make provision for the comfort of young gentlemen David Garrick, who was one of the pupils, used many years later to throw the best company of London int convulsions of laughter by mimicking the endearment of this extraordinary pair.

9. At length Johnson, in the twenty-eighth yea of his age, determined to seek his fortune in the capita as a literary adventurer. He set out with a few guineas three acts of the tragedy of "Irene" in manuscript and two or three letters of introduction from his frien Walmesley.

10. Never since literature became a calling in Eng land had it been a less gainful calling than at the tim when Johnson took up his residence in London. I the preceding generation, a writer of eminent mer was sure to be munificently rewarded by the goverr ment. The least that he could expect was a pensio or a sinecure place ; and, if he showed any aptitude fo politics, he might hope to be a member of parliamen a lord of the treasury, an ambassador, a secretary o state. It would be easy, on the other hand, to nam several writers of the nineteenth century of whom th least successful has received forty thousand pound from the booksellers. But Johnson entered on h vocation in the most dreary part of the dreary interv which separated two ages of prosperity. Literatu had ceased to flourish under the patronage of the grea and had not begun to flourish under the patronage of th blic. One man of letters, indeed, Pope, had ac-red by his pen what was then considered as a hand-ne fortune, and lived on a footing of equality with bles and ministers of state. But this was a solitary eption. Even an author whose reputation was eslished, and whose works were popular ; such an hor as Thomson, whose " Seasons " were in every rary ; such an author as Fielding, whose " Pasquin " had a greater run than any drama since the " Begs' Opera," was sometimes glad to obtain, by pawn-his best coat, the means of dining on tripe at a cook-p underground, where he could wipe his hands, after greasy meal, on the back of a Newfoundland dog.

s easy, therefore, to imagine what humiliations and vations must have awaited the novice who had still earn a name. One of the publishers to whom John-applied for employment, measured with a scornful that athletic, though uncouth, frame, and exclaimed,
You had better get a porter's knot, and carry trunks."
r was the advice bad ; for a porter was likely to be as ntifully fed, and as comfortably lodged, as a poet.

1. Some time appears to have elapsed before John-was able to form any literary connection from ich he could expect more than bread for the day ich was passing over him. He never forgot the erosity with which Hervey, who was now residing London, relieved his wants during his time of trial.
Harry Hervey," said the old philosopher many years
r, " was a vicious man ; but he was very kind to me.
you call a dog Hervey, I shall love him." At Hervey's table Johnson sometimes enjoyed fea which were made more agreeable by contrast. I in general he dined, and thought that he dined w on sixpennyworth of meat and a pennyworth of bre at an alehouse near Drury Lane.

12. The effect of the privations and sufferi which he endured at this time was discernible to t last in his temper and his deportment. His mann had never been courtly. They now became alm savage. Being frequently under the necessity of we ing shabby coats and dirty shirts, he became a c firmed sloven. Being often very hungry when he down to his meals, he contracted a habit of eating w ravenous greediness. Even to the end of his life, a even at the tables of the great, the sight of food affect him as it affects wild beasts and birds of prey. H taste in cookery, formed in subterranean ordinar and à la mode beefshops, was far from delicate. Wh ever he was so fortunate as to have near him a h that had been kept too long, or a meat-pie made w rancid butter, he gorged himself with such violer that his veins swelled, and the moisture broke out his forehead. The affronts which his poverty embo ened stupid and low-minded men to offer to him, wo have broken a mean spirit into sycophancy, but ma him rude even to ferocity. Unhappily the insole which, while it was defensive, was pardonable, and some sense respectable, accompanied him into societ where he was treated with courtesy and kindness. was repeatedly provoked into striking those who h aken liberties with him. All the sufferers, however, ere wise enough to abstain from talking about their eatings, except Osborne, the most rapacious and rutal of booksellers, who proclaimed everywhere hat he had been knocked down by the huge fellow hom he had hired to puff the Harleian Library.

13. About a year after Johnson had begun to reside n London, he was fortunate enough to obtain regular mployment from Cave, an enterprising and intelligent ookseller, who was proprietor and editor of the entleman's Magazine. That journal, just entering on he ninth year of its long existence, was the only eriodical work in the kingdom which then had what ould now be called a large circulation. It was, in- eed, the chief source of parliamentary intelligence. was not then safe, even during a recess, to publish n account of the proceedings of either House without me disguise. Cave, however, ventured to entertain is readers with what he called Reports of the Debates f the Senate of Lilliput. France was Blefuscu ; ondon was Mildendo ; pounds were sprugs ; the Duke f Newcastle was the Nardac Secretary of State ; ord Hardwicke was the Hurgo Hickrad ; and William ultency was Wingul Pulnub. To write the speeches as, during several years, the business of Johnson. He as generally furnished with notes, meagre, indeed, nd inaccurate, of what had been said ; but sometimes e had to find arguments and eloquence both for the inistry and for the opposition. He was himself a ory, not from rational conviction, — for his serious opinion was that one form of government was just a good or as bad as another, — but from mere passion such as inflamed the Capulets against the Montagues or the Blues of the Roman circus against the Greens

In his infancy he had heard so much talk about the vil lainies of the Whigs, and the dangers of the Church that he had become a furious partisan when he coul scarcely speak. Before he was three he had insisted on being taken to hear Sacheverell preach at Lichfield Cathedral, and had listened to the sermon with as much respect, and probably with as much intelligence, as any Staffordshire squire in the congregation. The work which had been begun in the nursery had been com pleted by the university. Oxford, when Johnson re sided there, was the most Jacobitical place in England and Pembroke was one of the most Jacobitical colleges in Oxford. The prejudices which he brought up to London were scarcely less absurd than those of his own "Tom Tempest." Charles II and James II were two of the best kings that ever reigned. Laud, a poor creature who never did, said, or wrote anything indi cating more than the ordinary capacity of an old woman, was a prodigy of parts and learning over whose tomb Art and Genius still continued to weep. Hamp den deserved no more honorable name than that of "the zealot of rebellion." Even the ship money, con demned not less decidedly by Falkland and Clarendon than by the bitterest Roundheads, Johnson would not pronounce to have been an unconstitutional impost.
Under a government the mildest that had ever been own in the world — under a government which alred to the people an unprecedented liberty of speech

l action, he fancied that he was a slave ; he assailed
e ministry with obloquy which refuted itself, and re-tted the lost freedom and happiness of those golden ys in which a writer who had taken but one-tenth rt of the license allowed to him, would have been loried, mangled with the shears, whipped at the cart's l, and flung into a noisome dungeon to die. He ed dissenters and stock-jobbers, the excise and the ny, septennial parliaments, and continental con-tions. He long had an aversion to the Scotch, aversion of which he could not remember the com-ncement, but which, he owned, had probably ginated in his abhorrence of the conduct of the nation ring the Great Rebellion. It is easy to guess in what nner debates on great party questions were likely be reported by a man whose judgment was so much ordered by party spirit. A show of fairness was ind necessary to the prosperity of the Magazine.
t Johnson long afterwards owned that, though he had red appearances, he had taken care that the Whig gs should not have the best of it ; and, in fact, every sage which has lived, every passage which bears the rks of his higher faculties, is put into the mouth of ne member of the opposition.

4. A few weeks after Johnson had entered on these cure labors, he published a work which at once ced him high among the writers of his age. It is bable that what he had suffered during his first year in London had often reminded him of some part of that noble poem in which Juvenal has described th misery and degradation of a needy man of letters lodged among the pigeons' nests in the tottering garret that overhung the streets of Rome. Pope's admirabl imitations of Horace's "Satires" and "Epistles" ha recently appeared, were in every hand, and were by man readers thought superior to the originals. What Pop had done for Horace, Johnson aspired to do for Juvenal The enterprise was bold, and yet judicious. For betwee Johnson and Juvenal there was much in common, muc more certainly than between Pope and Horace.

15. Johnson's "London" appeared without hi name in May, 1738. He received only ten guineas fo this stately and vigorous poem; but the sale was rapid and the success complete. A second edition was re quired within a week. Those small critics who ar always desirous to lower established reputations ra about proclaiming that the anonymous satirist wa superior to Pope in Pope's own peculiar department o literature. It ought to be remembered, to the hono of Pope, that he joined heartily in the applause wit which the appearance of a rival genius was welcomed He made inquiries about the author of "London." Such a man, he said, could not be long concealed. Th name was soon discovered; and Pope, with great kind ness, exerted himself to obtain an academical degree an the mastership of a grammar school for the poor youn poet. The attempt failed, and Johnson remained bookseller's hack.

16. It does not appear that these two men, the ost eminent writer of the generation which was going t, and the most eminent writer of the generation hich was coming in, ever saw each other. They lived very different circles ; one surrounded by dukes and rls, the other by starving pamphleteers and index-akers. Among Johnson's associates at this time may mentioned Boyse, who, when his shirts were pledged, rawled Latin verses sitting up in bed with his arms rough two holes in his blanket ; who composed very spectable sacred poetry when he was sober, and who as at last run over by a hackney coach when he was unk ; Hoole, surnamed the metaphysical tailor, who, stead of attending to his measures, used to trace ometrical diagrams on the board where he sat cross-gged ; and the penitent imposter, George Psalmana-r, who, after poring all day, in a humble lodging, on e folios of Jewish rabbis and Christian fathers, in-lged himself at night with literary and theological nversation at an alehouse in the city. But the most markable of the persons with whom at this time hnson consorted, was Richard Savage, an earl's son, shoemaker's apprentice, who had seen life in all its rms, who had feasted among blue ribands in St. mes's Square, and had lain with fifty pounds weight irons on his legs in the condemned ward of New-te. This man had, after many vicissitudes of for-ne, sunk at last into abject and hopeless poverty. is pen had failed him. His patrons had been taken vay by death, or estranged by the riotous profusion with which he squandered their bounty, and the ur grateful insolence with which he rejected their advic He now lived by begging. He dined on venison an champagne whenever he had been so fortunate as t borrow a guinea. If his questing had been unsuccessfu he appeased the rage of hunger with some scraps c broken meat, and lay down to rest under the Piazz of Covent Garden in warm weather, and in cold weathe as near as he could get to the furnace of a glass-hous Yet, in his misery, he was still an agreeable companion He had an inexhaustible store of anecdotes about tha gay and brilliant world from which he was now an ou cast. He had observed the great men of both partie in hours of careless relaxation ; had seen the leade of opposition without the mask of patriotism ; an had heard the prime minister roar with laughter, an tell stories not over decent. During some month Savage lived in the closest familiarity with Johnson and then the friends parted, not without tears. John son remained in London to drudge for Cave. Savag went to the west of England ; lived there as he ha lived everywhere ; and, in 1743, died, penniless an heart-broken, in Bristol jail.

17. Soon after his death, while the public curiosit was strongly excited about his extraordinary characte and his not less extraordinary adventures, a life of hi appeared, widely different from the catchpenny lives c eminent men which were then a staple article of manu facture in Grub Street. The style was indeed de ficient in ease and variety ; and the writer was ev

ntly too partial to the Latin element of our language. ıt the little work, with all its faults, was a master- ece. No finer specimen of literary biography existed any language, living or dead ; and a discerning critic ight have confidently predicted that the author was stined to be the founder of a new school of English oquence.

18. The " Life of Savage " was anonymous ; but it ıs well known in literary circles that Johnson was e writer. During the three years which followed, he oduced no important work ; but he was not, and deed could not be, idle. The fame of his abilities and ırning continued to grow. Warburton pronounced m a man of parts and genius ; and the praise of arburton was then no light thing. Such was John- n's reputation, that, in 1747, several eminent book- lers combined to employ him in the arduous work preparing a Dictionary of the English Language in o folio volumes. The sum which they agreed to pay m was only fifteen hundred guineas ; and out of this m he had to pay several poor men of letters who sisted him in the humbler parts of his task.

19. The prospectus of the Dictionary he addressed the Earl of Chesterfield. Chesterfield had long been ebrated for the politeness of his manners, the bril- ncy of his wit, and the delicacy of his taste. He ıs acknowledged to be the finest speaker in the House Lords. He had recently governed Ireland, at a omentous conjuncture, with eminent firmness, wis- m, and humanity, and he had since become Secretary of State. He received Johnson's homage with the mos winning affability, and requited it with a few guinea bestowed doubtless in a very graceful manner, bu was by no means desirous to see all his carpets blacl ened with the London mud, and his soups and wine thrown to right and left over the gowns of fine ladie and the waistcoats of fine gentlemen, by an absen awkward scholar, who gave strange starts, and uttere strange growls, who dressed like a scarecrow, and at like a cormorant. During some time Johnson continue to call on his patron ; but, after being repeatedly tol by the porter that his lordship was not at home, too the hint, and ceased to present himself at the inhos pitable door.

20. Johnson had flattered himself that he shoul have completed his Dictionary by the end of 1750 but it was not till 1755 that he at length gave his hug volumes to the world. During the seven years whic he passed in the drudgery of penning definitions an marking quotations for transcription, he sought fo relaxation in literary labor of a more agreeable kinc In 1749 he published the " Vanity of Human Wishes, an excellent imitation of the Tenth Satire of Juvena It is, in truth, not easy to say whether the palm belong to the ancient or to the modern poet. The couplet in which the fall of Wolsey is described, though loft and sonorous, are feeble when compared with th wonderful lines which bring before us all Rome i tumult on the day of the fall of Sejanus, the laurels o the doorposts, the white bull stalking towards th pitol, the statues rolling down from their pedestals, flatterers of the disgraced minister running to see dragged with a hook through the streets, and to ve a kick at his carcass before it is hurled into the ber. It must be owned, too, that in the concluding sage the Christian moralist has not made the most his advantages, and has fallen decidedly short of the olimity of his Pagan model. On the other hand, venal's Hannibal must yield to Johnson's Charles ; d Johnson's vigorous and pathetic enumeration of miseries of a literary life must be allowed to be erior to Juvenal's lamentation over the fate of mosthenes and Cicero.

1. For the copyright of the "Vanity of Human shes" Johnson received only fifteen guineas.

2. A few days after the publication of this poem, tragedy, begun many years before, was brought the stage. His pupil, David Garrick, had, in 1741, de his appearance on a humble stage in Goodman's lds, had at once risen to the first place among actors, d was now, after several years of almost uninterrupted cess, manager of Drury Lane Theatre. The relation ween him and his old preceptor was of a very singular d. They repelled each other strongly, and yet at- cted each other strongly. Nature had made them very different clay ; and circumstances had fully ught out the natural peculiarities of both. Sudden sperity had turned Garrick's head. Continued ad- sity had soured Johnson's temper. Johnson saw, h more envy than became so great a man, the villa,

the plate, the china, the Brussels carpet, which t little mimic had got by repeating, with grimaces a gesticulations, what wiser men had written ; and t exquisitely sensitive vanity of Garrick was galled the thought that, while all the rest of the world w applauding him, he could obtain from one moro cynic, whose opinion it was impossible to despis scarcely any compliment not acidulated with scor
Yet the two Lichfield men had so many early rec lections in common, and sympathized with each oth
on so many points on which they sympathized wi nobody else in the vast population of the capital, tha though the master was often provoked by the monke like impertinence of the pupil, and the pupil by t bearish rudeness of the master, they remained frien till they were parted by death. Garrick now broug
"Irene" out, with alterations sufficient to displea
the author, yet not sufficient to make the piece pleasi to the audience. The public, however, listened wi little emotion, but with much civility, to five acts monotonous declamation. After nine representatio the play was withdrawn. It is, indeed, altogeth unsuited to the stage, and, even when perused in t closet, will be found hardly worthy of the author.
had not the slightest notion of what blank ver should be. A change in the last syllable of every oth line would make the versification of the "Vani
of Human Wishes" closely resemble the versificati of "Irene." The poet, however, cleared, by his ben fit-nights, and by the sale of the copyright of gedy, about three hundred pounds, then a great sum his estimation.

23. About a year after the representation of rene," he began to publish a series of short essays on rals, manners, and literature. This species of comition had been brought into fashion by the success
the Tatler, and by the still more brilliant success of Spectator. A crowd of small writers had vainly atipted to rival Addison. The Lay Monastery, the isor, the Freethinker, the Plain Dealer, the Champion, l other works of the same kind, had had their short
r. None of them had obtained a permanent place our literature ; and they are now to be found only the libraries of the curious. At length Johnson dertook the adventure in which so many aspirants
l failed. In the thirty-sixth year after the appear-e of the last number of the Spectator, appeared the t number of the Rambler. From March, 1750, to rch, 1752, this paper continued to come out every esday and Saturday.

24. From the first the Rambler was enthusiastically mired by a few eminent men. Richardson, when y five numbers had appeared, pronounced it equal, ot superior, to the Spectator. Young and Hartley ressed their approbation not less warmly. Bubb dington, among whose many faults indifference to claims of genius and learning cannot be reckoned, cited the acquaintance of the writer. In consence probably of the good offices of Dodington, who s then the confidential adviser of Prince Frederick,

two of his Royal Highness's gentlemen carried gracious message to the printing-office, and orde seven copies for Leicester House. But these overtu seem to have been very coldly received. Johnson h had enough of the patronage of the great to last him his life, and was not disposed to haunt any other d as he had haunted the door of Chesterfield.

25. By the public the Rambler was at first v coldly received. Though the price of a number w only twopence, the sale did not amount to five hundr The profits were therefore very small. But as soon the flying leaves were collected and reprinted they came popular. The author lived to see thirt thousand copies spread over England alone. Separ editions were published for the Scotch and Irish m kets. A large party pronounced the style perfect, absolutely perfect that in some essays it would be i possible for the writer himself to alter a single word the better. Another party, not less numerous, hemently accused him of having corrupted the pur of the English tongue. The best critics admitted th his diction was too monotonous, too obviously artifici and now and then turgid even to absurdity. But th did justice to the acuteness of his observations morals and manners, to the constant precision a frequent brilliancy of his language, to the weighty a magnificent eloquence of many serious passages a to the solemn yet pleasing humor of some of the ligh papers. On the question of precedence between A dison and Johnson, a question which, seventy ye go, was much disputed, posterity has pronounced a ecision from which there is no appeal. Sir Roger, his aplain and his butler, Will Wimble and Will Honeymb, the Vision of Mirza, the Journal of the Retired tizen, the Everlasting Club, the Dunmow Flitch, e Loves of Hilpah and Shalum, the Visit to the Exange, and the Visit to the Abbey, are known to everydy. But many men and women, even of highly ltivated minds, are unacquainted with Squire Bluster d Mrs. Busy, Quisquilius and Venustulus, the Allery of Wit and Learning, the Chronicle of the Revotions of a Garret, and the sad fate of Aningait and ut.

26. The last Rambler was written in a sad and oomy hour. Mrs. Johnson had been given over by e physicians. Three days later she died. She left r husband almost broken-hearted. Many people d been surprised to see a man of his genius and learng stooping to every drudgery, and denying himself most every comfort, for the purpose of supplying a dy, affected old woman with superfluities, which she cepted with but little gratitude. But all his affecon had been concentrated on her. He had neither other nor sister, neither son nor daughter. To him e was beautiful as the Gunnings, and witty as Lady ary. Her opinion of his writings was more important him than the voice of the pit of Drury Lane Theatre, the judgment of the Monthly Review. The chief pport which had sustained him through the most duous labor of his life was the hope that she would enjoy the fame and the profit which he anticipated from his Dictionary. She was gone; and in that vast labyrinth of streets, peopled by eight hundred thousand human beings, he was alone. Yet it was necessary for him to set himself, as he expressed it, doggedly to work. After three more laborious years, the Dictionary was at length complete.

27. It had been generally supposed that this great work would be dedicated to the eloquent and accomplished nobleman to whom the Prospectus had been addressed. He well knew the value of such a compliment; and therefore, when the day of publication drew near, he exerted himself to soothe, by a show of zealous and at the same time of delicate and judicious kindness, the pride which he had so cruelly wounded. Since the Ramblers had ceased to appear, the town had been entertained by a journal called The World, to which many men of high rank and fashion contributed. In two successive numbers of The World, the Dictionary was, to use the modern phrase, puffed with wonderful skill. The writings of Johnson were warmly praised. It was proposed that he should be invested with the authority of a Dictator, nay, of a Pope, over our language, and that his decisions about the meaning and the spelling of words should be received as final. His two folios, it was said, would of course be bought by everybody who could afford to buy them. It was soon known that these papers were written by Chesterfield. But the just resentment of Johnson was not to be so appeased. In a letter written with singular energy and gnity of thought and language, he repelled the tardy vances of his patron. The Dictionary came forth thout a dedication. In the preface the author truly clared that he owed nothing to the great, and de-ibed the difficulties with which he had been left to ruggle so forcibly and pathetically, that the ablest d most malevolent of all the enemies of his fame, orne Tooke, never could read that passage without ars.

28. The public, on this occasion, did Johnson full stice, and something more than justice. The best icographer may well be content if his productions e received by the world with cold esteem. But hnson's Dictionary was hailed with an enthusiasm ch as no similar work has ever excited. It was, in-ed, the first dictionary which could be read with easure. The definitions show so much acuteness of ought and command of language, and the passages oted from poets, divines, and philosophers are so lfully selected, that a leisure hour may always be y agreeably spent in turning over the pages. The lts of the book resolve themselves, for the most part, o one great fault. Johnson was a wretched ety-logist. He knew little or nothing of any Teutonic nguage except English, which, indeed, as he wrote it, s scarcely a Teutonic language ; and thus he was ab-utely at the mercy of Junius and Skinner.

29. The Dictionary, though it raised Johnson's ne, added nothing to his pecuniary means. The een hundred guineas which the booksellers had agreed to pay him nad been advanced and spent befor the last sheets issued from the press. It is painful t relate that, twice in the course of the year which fo lowed the publication of this great work, he was ar rested and carried to spunging-houses, and that he wa twice indebted for his liberty to his excellent frien Richardson. It was still necessary for the man who ha been formally saluted by the highest authority a Dictator of the English language to supply his want by constant toil. He abridged his Dictionary. H proposed to bring out an edition of Shakespeare b subscription ; and many subscribers sent in their name and laid down their money. But he soon found th task so little to his taste, that he turned to more at tractive employments. He contributed many paper to a new monthly journal, which was called the Literar Magazine. Few of these papers have much interest but among them was the very best thing that he eve wrote, a masterpiece both of reasoning and of satirica pleasantry, the review of Jenyns's "Inquiry into th Nature and Origin of Evil."

30. In the spring of 1758 Johnson put forth th first of a series of essays, entitled the Idler. During tw years these essays continued to appear weekly. The were eagerly read, widely circulated, and, indeed, in pudently pirated, while they were still in the origin form, and had a large sale when collected into volume The Idler may be described as a second part of th Rambler, somewhat livelier and somewhat weaker tha the first part.

JOHNSON'S HOME IN THE TEMPLE

31. While Johnson was busied with his Idlers, his mother, who had accomplished her ninetieth year, died at Lichfield. It was long since he had seen her; but he had not failed to contribute largely, out of his small means, to her comfort. In order to defray the charges of her funeral, and to pay some debts which she had left, he wrote a little book in a single week, and sent off the sheets to the press without reading them over. A hundred pounds were paid him for the copyright; and the purchasers had great cause to be pleased with their bargain, for the book was "Rasselas."

32. The success of "Rasselas" was great, though such ladies as Miss Lydia Languish must have been grievously disappointed when they found that the new volume from the circulating library was little more than a dissertation on the author's favorite theme, the Vanity of Human Wishes; that the Prince of Abyssinia was without a mistress, and the Princess without a lover; and that the story set the hero and the heroine down exactly where it had taken them up. The style was the subject of much eager controversy. The Monthly Review and the Critical Review took different sides. Many readers pronounced the writer a pompous pedant, who would never use a word of two syllables where it was possible to use a word of six, and who could not make a waiting-woman relate her adventures without balancing every noun with another noun, and every epithet with another epithet. Another party, not less zealous, cited with delight numerous passages in which eighty meaning was expressed with accuracy and ıstrated with splendor. And both the censure and e praise were merited.

33. About the plan of " Rasselas " little was said by e critics ; and yet the faults of the plan might seem invite severe criticism. Johnson has frequently amed Shakespeare for neglecting the proprieties of ne and place, and for ascribing to one age or nation
e manners and opinions of another. Yet Shakespeare s not sinned in this way more grievously than John-
n. Rasselas and Imlac, Nekayah and Pekuah, are idently meant to be Abyssinians of the eighteenth ntury — for the Europe which Imlac describes is e Europe of the eighteenth century — and the inates of the Happy Valley talk familiarly of that law gravitation which Newton discovered, and which s not fully received even at Cambridge till the hteenth century. What a real company of Abysians would have been may be learned from " Bruce's avels." But Johnson, not content with turning hy savages, ignorant of their letters, and gorged
h raw steaks cut from living cows, into philosophers eloquent and enlightened as himself or his friend
rke, and into ladies as highly accomplished as Mrs.
nnox or Mrs. Sheridan, transferred the whole do-stic system of England to Egypt. Into a land of ems, a land of polygamy, a land where women are rried without ever being seen, he introduced the ations and jealousies of our ballrooms. In a land ere there is boundless liberty of divorce, wedlock is described as the indissoluble compact. "A youth and maiden meeting by chance, or brought together by artifice, exchange glances, reciprocate civilities, go home and dream of each other. Such," says Rasselas "is the common process of marriage." Such it may have been, and may still be, in London, but assuredly not at Cairo. A writer who was guilty of such impropriety had little right to blame the poet who made Hector quote Aristotle, and represented Julio Romano as flourishing in the days of the oracle of Delphi.

34. By such exertions as have been described, Johnson supported himself till the year 1762. In that year a great change in his circumstances took place. He had from a child been an enemy of the reigning dynasty. His Jacobite prejudices had been exhibited with little disguise both in his works and in his conversation. Even in his massy and elaborate Dictionary he had, with a strange want of taste and judgment, inserted bitter and contumelious reflections on the Whig party. The excise, which was a favorite resource of Whig financiers, he had designated as a hateful tax. He had railed against the commissioners of excise in language so coarse that they had seriously thought of prosecuting him. He had with difficulty been prevented from holding up the Lord Privy Seal by name as an example of the meaning of the word "renegade." A pension he had defined as pay given to a state hireling to betray his country; a pensioner as a slave of state hired by a stipend to obey a master. It seemed unlikely that the author of these definitions would himself be pensioned.

ıt that was a time of wonders. George the Third had ended the throne ; and had, in the course of a few nths, disgusted many of the old friends, and con-iated many of the old enemies of his house. The city
s becoming mutinous ; Oxford was becoming loyal.
vendishes and Bentincks were murmuring. Somers and Wyndhams were hastening to kiss hands. The ad of the treasury was now Lord Bute, who was a ry, and could have no objection to Johnson's Tory-
n. Bute wished to be thought a patron of men of ters ; and Johnson was one of the most eminent d one of the most needy men of letters in Europe.
pension of three hundred a year was graciously ered, and with very little hesitation accepted.

35. This event produced a change in Johnson s old way of life. For the first time since his boyhood no longer felt the daily goad urging him to the daily
l. He was at liberty, after thirty years of anxiety
d drudgery, to indulge his constitutional indolence ; lie in bed till two in the afternoon, and to sit up talk-till four in the morning, without fearing either the nter's devil or the sheriff's officer.

36. One laborious task indeed he had bound himself perform. He had received large subscriptions for promised edition of Shakespeare ; he had lived on se subscriptions during some years ; and he could without disgrace omit to perform his part of the ntract. His friends repeatedly exhorted him to ke an effort ; and he repeatedly resolved to do so.
t, notwithstanding their exhortations and his resolutions, month followed month, year followed year, an nothing was done. He prayed fervently against h idleness. He determined, as often as he received th sacrament, that he would no longer doze away and trif away his time ; but the spell under which he lay re sisted prayer and sacrament. His private notes at thi time are made up of self-reproaches. " My indolence, he wrote on Easter Eve in 1764, " has sunk into grosse sluggishness. A kind of strange oblivion has ove spread me, so that I know not what has become of th last year." Easter, 1765, came, and found him sti in the same state. " My time," he wrote, " has bee unprofitably spent and seems as a dream that has le nothing behind. My memory grows confused, and know not how the days pass over me." Happily fo his honor, the charm which held him captive was a length broken by no gentle or friendly hand. He ha been weak enough to pay serious attention to a stor about a ghost which haunted a house in Cock Lan and had actually gone himself, with some of his frien at one in the morning, to St. John's Church, Clerke well, in the hope of receiving a communication from th perturbed spirit. But the spirit, though adjured wit all solemnity, remained obstinately silent ; and it soo appeared that a naughty girl of eleven had been amusin herself by making fools of so many philosopher Churchill, who, confident in his powers, drunk wit popularity and burning with party spirit, was lookin for some man of established fame and Tory politics t insult, celebrated the Cock Lane Ghost in three canto cknamed Johnson "Pomposo," asked where the book

as which had been so long promised and so liberally id for, and directly accused the great moralist of cheat-
g. This terrible word proved effectual; and in tober, 1765, appeared, after a delay of nine years, the w edition of Shakespeare.

37. This publication saved Johnson's character for nesty, but added nothing to the fame of his abilities
d learning. The preface, though it contains some od passages, is not in his best manner. The most luable notes are those in which he had an opportunity showing how attentively he had during many years served human life and human nature. The best ecimen is the note on the character of Polonius.
othing so good is to be found even in Wilhelm Meis-r's admirable examination of "Hamlet." But here aise must end. It would be difficult to name a more venly, a more worthless, edition of any great classic.
he reader may turn over play after play without find-
g one happy conjectural emendation, or one ingenious
d satisfactory explanation of a passage which had ffled preceding commentators. Johnson had, in his ospectus, told the world that he was peculiarly fitted the task which he had undertaken, because he had, a lexicographer, been under the necessity of taking vider view of the English language than any of his edecessors. That his knowledge of our literature s extensive, is indisputable. But, unfortunately, he l altogether neglected that very part of our literature
h which it is especially desirable than an editor of Shakespeare should be conversant. It is dangerous t assert a negative. Yet little will be risked by th assertion, that in the two folio volumes of the Englis Dictionary there is not a single passage quoted from an dramatist of the Elizabethan age, except Shakespear and Ben. Even from Ben the quotations are few Johnson might easily, in a few months, have mad himself well acquainted with every old play that wa extant. But it never seems to have occurred to hir that this was a necessary preparation for the wor which he had undertaken. He would doubtless hav admitted that it would be the height of absurdity in man who was not familiar with the works of Aeschylu and Euripides to publish an edition of Sophocles. Ye he ventured to publish an edition of Shakespeare, with out having ever in his life, as far as can be discovered

read a single scene of Massinger, Ford, Decker, Webster Marlowe, Beaumont, or Fletcher. His detractors wer noisy and scurrilous. Those who most loved an honored him had little to say in praise of the manne
in which he had discharged the duty of a commentator
He had, however, acquitted himself of a debt which had long lain heavy on his conscience, and he sank back into the repose from which the sting of satire ha roused him. He long continued to live upon the fam which he had already won. He was honored by th University of Oxford with a Doctor's degree, by th
Royal Academy with a professorship, and by the Kin with an interview, in which his Majesty most graciously expressed a hope that so excellent a writer would no se to write. In the interval, however, between 1765 1775, Johnson published only two or three political cts, the longest of which he could have produced in y-eight hours, if he had worked as he worked on the ife of Savage " and on " Rasselas."

8. But though his pen was now idle his tongue active. The influence exercised by his conversa-, directly upon those with whom he lived, and in-ctly on the whole literary world, was altogether nout a parallel. His colloquial talents were, indeed, he highest order. He had strong sense, quick dis-ament, wit, humor, immense knowledge of literature of life, and an infinite store of curious anecdotes. respected style, he spoke far better than he wrote. ry sentence which dropped from his lips was as ect in structure as the most nicely balanced period ne Rambler. But in his talk there were no pompous ds, and little more than a fair proportion of words sity and ation. All was simplicity, ease, and vigor. uttered his short, weighty, and pointed sentences a power of voice, and a justness and energy of phasis, of which the effect was rather increased than inished by the rollings of his huge form, and by the matic gaspings and puffings in which the peals of eloquence generally ended. Nor did the laziness ch made him unwilling to sit down to his desk pre-t him from giving instruction or entertainment ly. To discuss questions of taste, of learning, of istry, in language so exact and so forcible that it ht have been printed without the alteration of a word, was to him no exertion, but a pleasure. H loved, as he said, to fold his legs and have his talk ou

He was ready to bestow the overflowings of his f mind on anybody who would start a subject ; on fellow-passenger in a stage coach, or on the person wh sat at the same table with him in an eating-house. B his conversation was nowhere so brilliant and striki as when he was surrounded by a few friends who abilities and knowledge enabled them, as he once e pressed it, to send him back every ball that he thre
Some of these, in 1764, formed themselves into a clu which gradually became a formidable power in t commonwealth of letters. The verdicts pronounc by this conclave on new books were speedily know over all London, and were sufficient to sell off a whc edition in a day, or to condemn the sheets to the servi of the trunk maker and the pastry cook. Nor shall w think this strange when we consider what great an various talents and acquirements met in the litt fraternity. Goldsmith was the representative of poet and light literature, Reynolds of the arts, Burke political eloquence and political philosophy. Ther too, were Gibbon, the greatest historian, and Jones, th greatest linguist, of the age. Garrick brought to th meetings his inexhaustible pleasantry, his incomparab mimicry, and his consummate knowledge of stage effec
Among the most constant attendants were two hig born and high-bred gentlemen, closely bound togeth by friendship, but of widely different characters an habits, — Bennet Langton, distinguished by his sk

THE LITERARY CLUB AT SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS'

Boswell Reynolds Garrick di Paoli T. Warton
Dr. Johnson Burke Dr. Burney Goldsmith

in Greek literature, by the orthodoxy of his opinion and by the sanctity of his life ; and Topham Beaucler renowned for his amours, his knowledge of the g world, his fastidious taste, and his sarcastic wit. predominate over such a society was not easy. Y even over such a society Johnson predominated. Burl might, indeed, have disputed the supremacy to whi others were under the necessity of submitting. B Burke, though not generally a very patient listene was content to take the second part when Johnson w present ; and the club itself, consisting of so mar eminent men, is to this day popularly designated Johnson's Club.

39. Among the members of this celebrated boc was one to whom it has owed the greater part of i celebrity, yet who was regarded with little respect b his brethren, and had not without difficulty obtaine a seat among them. This was James Boswell, a youn Scotch lawyer, heir to an honorable name and a fa estate. That he was a coxcomb and a bore, weak, vai pushing, curious, garrulous, was obvious to all who we acquainted with him. That he could not reason, th he had no wit, no humor, no eloquence, is apparent fro his writings. And yet his writings are read beyond t Mississippi, and under the Southern Cross, and a likely to be read as long as the English exists, either a living or as a dead language. Nature had made hi a slave and an idolater. His mind resembled tho creepers which the botanists call parasites, and whi can subsist only by clinging round the stems and in ing the juices of stronger plants. He must have tened himself on somebody. He might have fastened nself on Wilkes, and have become the fiercest patriot the Bill of Rights Society. He might have fastened nself on Whitefield, and have become the loudest d preacher among the Calvinistic Methodists. In a ppy hour he fastened himself on Johnson. The pair ght seem ill matched. For Johnson had early been ejudiced against Boswell's country. To a man of nnson's strong understanding and irritable temper, e silly egotism and adulation of Boswell must have en as teasing as the constant buzz of a fly. Johnson ted to be questioned ; and Boswell was eternally echizing him on all kinds of subjects, and sometimes pounded such questions as, " What would you do, if you were locked up in a tower with a baby ? " nnson was a water-drinker, and Boswell was a wine-ber, and indeed little better than an habitual sot. was impossible that there should be perfect harmony tween two such companions. Indeed, the great man s sometimes provoked into fits of passion, in which said things which the small man, during a few hours, iously resented. Every quarrel, however, was soon de up. During twenty years the disciple continued worship the master ; the master continued to scold disciple, to sneer at him, and to love him. The two nds ordinarily resided at a great distance from each er. Boswell practised in the Parliament House of inburgh, and could pay only occasional visits to ndon. During those visits his chief business was to watch Johnson, to discover all Johnson's habits, t turn the conversation to subjects about which Johnso was likely to say something remarkable, and to fi quarto note-books with minutes of what Johnson ha said. In this way were gathered the materials, out which was afterwards constructed the most interestin biographical work in the world.

40. Soon after the club began to exist, Johnso formed a connection less important indeed to his fam
but much more important to his happiness, than hi connection with Boswell. Henry Thrale, one of th
most opulent brewers in the kingdom, a man of soun and cultivated understanding, rigid principles, an liberal spirit, was married to one of those clever, kind hearted, engaging, vain, pert young women, who ar perpetually doing or saying what is not exactly right but who, do or say what they may, are always agreeabl
In 1765 the Thrales became acquainted with Johnson and the acquaintance ripened fast into friendship
They were astonished and delighted by the brilliancy of his conversation. They were flattered by findin that a man so widely celebrated preferred their hous
to any other in London. Even the peculiarities whic seemed to unfit him for civilized society, — his gesticula tions, his rollings, his puffings, his mutterings, th strange way in which he put on his clothes, the ravenou eagerness with which he devoured his dinner, his fit of melancholy, his fits of anger, his frequent rudenes
his occasional ferocity, — increased the interest whic his new associates took in him. For these things wer

JAMES BOSWELL

the cruel marks left behind by a life which had been o long conflict with disease and adversity. In a vulg hack writer, such oddities would have excited only d gust. But in a man of genius, learning, and virtu their effect was to add pity to admiration and estee
Johnson soon had an apartment at the brewery Southwark, and a still more pleasant apartment
the villa of his friends on Streatham Common. A lar part of every year he passed in those abodes — abod which must have seemed magnificent and luxurious i deed, when compared with the dens in which he h generally been lodged. But his chief pleasures we derived from what the astronomer of his Abyssinia tale called "the endearing elegance of female frien ship." Mrs. Thrale rallied him, soothed him, coax him ; and, if she sometimes provoked him by her fli pancy, made ample amends by listening to his reproo with angelic sweetness of temper. When he was di eased in body and in mind, she was the most tender nurses. No comfort that wealth could purchase, n contrivance that womanly ingenuity, set to work b womanly compassion, could devise, was wanting to h sick-room. He requited her kindness by an affectio pure as the affection of a father, yet delicately tinge with a gallantry which, though awkward, must hav been more flattering than the attentions of a crowd
the fools who gloried in the names, now obsolete, Buck and Maccaroni. It should seem that a full ha of Johnson's life, during about sixteen years, was passe
under the roof of the Thrales. He accompanied th

nily sometimes to Bath, and sometimes to Brighton, ce to Wales, and once to Paris. But he had at the ne time a house in one of the narrow and gloomy urts on the north of Fleet Street. In the garrets was library, a large and miscellaneous collection of oks, falling to pieces and begrimed with dust. On a ver floor he sometimes, but very rarely, regaled a end with a plain dinner, — a veal pie, or a leg of nb and spinach, and a rice pudding. Nor was the elling uninhabited during his long absences. It was e home of the most extraordinary assemblage of nates that ever was brought together. At the head the establishment Johnson had placed an old lady med Williams, whose chief recommendations were her ndness and her poverty. But, in spite of her mur- rs and reproaches, he gave an asylum to another y who was as poor as herself, Mrs. Desmoulins, ose family he had known many years before in affordshire. Room was found for the daughter of s. Desmoulins, and for another destitute damsel, o was generally addressed as Miss Carmichael, but om her generous host called Polly. An old quack ctor named Levett, who bled and dosed coal-heavers d hackney coachmen, and received for fees crusts bread, bits of bacon, glasses of gin, and sometimes ttle copper, completed this strange menagerie. All se poor creatures were at constant war with each er, and with Johnson's negro servant Frank. Some- es, indeed, they transferred their hostilities from the vant to the master, complained that a better table was not kept for them, and railed or maundered ti their benefactor was glad to make his escape to Stre tham, or to the Mitre Tavern. And yet he, who wa generally the haughtiest and most irritable of mankin who was but too prompt to resent anything whic looked like a slight on the part of a purse-proud boo seller, or of a noble and powerful patron, bore patientl from mendicants, who, but for his bounty, must hav gone to the workhouse, insults more provoking tha those for which he had knocked down Osborne an bidden defiance to Chesterfield. Year after year Mr Williams and Mrs. Desmoulins, Polly and Levett, co tinued to torment him and to live upon him.

41. The course of life which has been described wa interrupted in Johnson's sixty-fourth year by an im important event. He had early read an account of th Hebrides, and had been much interested by learnin that there was so near him a land peopled by a rac which was still as rude and simple as in the Middl Ages. A wish to become intimately acquainted wit
a state of society so utterly unlike all that he had eve seen frequently crossed his mind. But it is not probabl that his curiosity would have overcome his habitua sluggishness, and his love of the smoke, the mud, an the cries of London, had not Boswell importuned hi to attempt the adventure, and offered to be his squir
At length, in August, 1773, Johnson crossed the High land line, and plunged courageously into what wa then considered, by most Englishmen, as a dreary an perilous wilderness. After wandering about tw

MRS. THRALE

months through the Celtic region, sometimes in rud boats which did not protect him from the rain, an sometimes on small shaggy ponies which could hardl bear his weight, he returned to his old haunts with mind full of new images and new theories. Durin
the following year he employed himself in recordin his adventures. About the beginning of 1775 hi "Journey to the Hebrides" was published, and was during some weeks, the chief subject of conversatio in all circles in which any attention was paid to litera ture. The book is still read with pleasure. The narra tive is entertaining; the speculations, whether soun or unsound, are always ingenious; and the style, thoug too stiff and pompous, is somewhat easier and mor graceful than that of his early writings. His prejudic against the Scotch had at length become little mor than matter of jest; and whatever remained of the ol feeling had been effectually removed by the kind an respectful hospitality with which he had been receive in every part of Scotland. It was, of course, not to b expected that an Oxonian Tory should praise the Pres byterian polity and ritual, or that an eye accustomed t
the hedge-rows and parks of England should not b struck by the bareness of Berwickshire and East Lothian
But even in censure Johnson's tone is not unfriendly
The most enlightened Scotchmen, with Lord Mansfiel at their head, were well pleased. But some foolish and ignorant Scotchmen were moved to anger by little unpalatable truth, which was mingled with much eulogy, and assailed him whom they chose to conside

the enemy of their country with libels much more honorable to their country than anything that he d ever said or written. They published paragraphs the newspapers, articles in the magazines, sixpenny mphlets, five-shilling books. One scribbler abused nson for being blear-eyed ; another, for being a sioner ; a third informed the world that one of the ctor's uncles had been convicted of felony in Scotd, and had found that there was in that country one e capable of supporting the weight of an Englishman. acpherson, whose " Fingal " had been proved in the ourney " to be an impudent forgery, threatened to e vengeance with a cane. The only effect of this eat was that Johnson reiterated the charge of forgery the most contemptuous terms, and walked about, ing some time, with a cudgel, which, if the impostor l not been too wise to encounter it, would assuredly ve descended upon him, to borrow the sublime guage of his own epic poem, " like a hammer on the son of the furnace."

42. Of other assailants Johnson took no notice atever. He had early resolved never to be drawn o controversy ; and he adhered to his resolution with teadfastness which is the more extraordinary, bese he was, both intellectually and morally, of the ff of which controversialists are made. In consation, he was a singularly eager, acute, and peracious disputant. When at a loss for good reasons, had recourse to sophistry ; and when heated by rcation, he made unsparing use of sarcasm and invective. But when he took his pen in his hand, h whole character seemed to be changed. A hundred ba writers misrepresented him and reviled him ; but nc one of the hundred could boast of having been thoug by him worthy of a refutation, or even of a retor The Kenricks, Campbells, MacNicols, and Hende sons did their best to annoy him, in the hope that h would give them importance by answering them. Bu the reader will in vain search his works for any allusio to Kenrick or Campbell, to MacNicol or Henderso One Scotchman, bent on vindicating the fame of Scotc learning, defied him to the combat in a detestable Lati hexameter :

"Maxime, si tu vis, cupio contendere tecum."

43. But Johnson took no notice of the challeng He had learned, both from his own observation an from literary history, in which he was deeply read, tha the place of books in the public estimation is fixed, nc by what is written about them, but by what is writte in them ; and that an author whose works are likel to live is very unwise if he stoops to wrangle with de tractors whose works are certain to die. He alway maintained that fame was a shuttlecock which coul be kept up only by being beaten back, as well as beate forward, and which would soon fall if there were onl one battledore. No saying was oftener in his mout than that fine apophthegm of Bentley, that no man wa ever written down but by himself.

44. Unhappily, a few months after the appearanc

the "Journey to the Hebrides" Johnson did what one of his envious assailants could have done, and to certain extent succeeded in writing himself down. he disputes between England and her American colo- es had reached a point at which no amicable adjust- ent was possible. Civil war was evidently impend- g; and the ministers seem to have thought that the oquence of Johnson might with advantage be em- oyed to inflame the nation against the opposition re, and against the rebels beyond the Atlantic. He d already written two or three tracts in defence of e foreign and domestic policy of the government; d those tracts, though hardly worthy of him, were uch superior to the crowd of pamphlets which lay on e counters of Almon and Stockdale. But his "Taxa- on No Tyranny" was a pitiable failure. The very le was a silly phrase, which can have been recom- ended to his choice by nothing but a jingling alliterа- on which he ought to have despised. The arguments ere such as boys use in debating societies. The easantry was as awkward as the gambols of a hippo- tamus. Even Boswell was forced to own that, in is unfortunate piece, he could detect no trace of his aster's powers. The general opinion was that the rong faculties which had produced the Dictionary d the Rambler were beginning to feel the effect of ne and of disease, and that the old man would best nsult his credit by writing no more.

45. But this was a great mistake. Johnson had led, not because his mind was less vigorous than when he wrote "Rasselas" in the evenings of a week but because he had foolishly chosen, or suffered other to choose for him, a subject such as he would at no time have been competent to treat. He was in no sense a statesman. He never willingly read or thought or talked about affairs of state. He loved biography, literary history, the history of manners; but political history was positively distasteful to him. The question at issue between the colonies and the mother country was a question about which he had really nothing to say. He failed, therefore, as the greatest men must fail when they attempt to do that for which they are unfit; as Burke would have failed if Burke had tried to write comedies like those of Sheridan; as Reynolds would have failed if Reynolds had tried to paint landscapes like those of Wilson. Happily, Johnson soon had an opportunity of proving most signally that his failure was not to be ascribed to intellectual decay.

46. On Easter Eve, 1777, some persons, deputed by a meeting which consisted of forty of the first booksellers in London, called upon him. Though he had some scruples about doing business at that season, he received his visitors with much civility. They came to inform him that a new edition of the English poets, from Cowley downwards, was in contemplation, and to ask him to furnish short biographical prefaces. He readily undertook the task, — a task for which he was pre-eminently qualified. His knowledge of the literary history of England since the Restoration was univalled. That knowledge he had derived partly from ooks, and partly from sources which had long been losed, — from old Grub Street traditions ; from the alk of forgotten poetasters and pamphleteers who had ong been lying in parish vaults ; from the recollections f such men as Gilbert Walmesley, who had conversed ith the wits of Button ; Cibber, who had mutilated the lays of two generations of dramatists ; Orrery, who ad been admitted to the society of Swift ; and Savage, ho had rendered services of no very honorable kind o Pope. The biographer therefore sat down to his ask with a mind full of matter. He had at first inended to give only a paragraph to every minor poet, nd only four or five pages to the greatest name. But he flood of anecdote and criticism overflowed the arrow channel. The work, which was originally neant to consist only of a few sheets, swelled into ten olumes, — small volumes, it is true, and not closely rinted. The first four appeared in 1779, the remaining six in 1781.

47. The " Lives of the Poets " are, on the whole, he best of Johnson's works. The narratives are as ntertaining as any novel. The remarks on life and on uman nature are eminently shrewd and profound. The criticisms are often excellent, and, even when rossly and provokingly unjust, well deserve to be tudied. For, however erroneous they may be, they re never silly. They are the judgments of a mind rammelled by prejudice and deficient in sensibility, ut vigorous and acute. They therefore generally contain a portion of valuable truth which deserves to be separated from the alloy ; and, at the very worst, they mean something; a praise to which much of what is called criticism in our time has no pretensions.

48. Savage's " Life " Johnson reprinted nearly as it had appeared in 1744. Whoever, after reading that life, will turn to the other lives, will be struck by the difference of style. Since Johnson had been at ease in his circumstances he had written little and talked much. When, therefore, he, after the lapse of years, resumed his pen, the mannerism which he had contracted while he was in the constant habit of elaborate composition, was less perceptible than formerly ; and his diction frequently had a colloquial ease which it had formerly wanted. The improvement may be discerned by a skilful critic in the " Journey to the Hebrides," and in the " Lives of the Poets " is so obvious that it cannot escape the notice of the most careless reader.

49. Among the lives the best are perhaps those of Cowley, Dryden, and Pope. The very worst is, beyond all doubt, that of Gray.

50. This great work at once became popular. There was, indeed, much just and much unjust censure ; but even those who were loudest in blame were attracted by the book in spite of themselves. Malone computed the gains of the publishers at five or six thousand pounds. But the writer was very poorly remunerated. Intending at first to write very short prefaces, he had stipulated for only two hundred uineas. The booksellers, when they saw how far is performance had surpassed his promise, added only nother hundred. Indeed, Johnson, though he did not espise, or affect to despise, money, and though his rong sense and long experience ought to have qualified im to protect his own interests, seems to have been ngularly unskilful and unlucky in his literary bargains. Ie was generally reputed the first English writer of his me. Yet several writers of his time sold their copy-ghts for sums such as he never ventured to ask. To ve a single instance, Robertson received four thousand ve hundred pounds for the "History of Charles V"; nd it is no disrespect to the memory of Robertson to y that the "History of Charles V" is both a less aluable and a less amusing book than the "Lives of ie Poets."

51. Johnson was now in his seventy-second year. he infirmities of age were coming fast upon him. hat inevitable event of which he never thought with-ut horror was brought near to him; and his whole life as darkened by the shadow of death. He had often o pay the cruel price of longevity. Every year he lost hat could never be replaced. The strange dependants o whom he had given shelter, and to whom, in spite of heir faults, he was strongly attached by habit, dropped f one by one; and, in the silence of his home, he re-retted even the noise of their scolding matches. The ind and generous Thrale was no more; and it would ave been well if his wife had been laid beside him. ut she survived to be the laughing-stock of those who had envied her, and to draw from the eyes of the old man who had loved her beyond anything in the world tears far more bitter than he would have shed over her grave. With some estimable and many agreeable qualities, she was not made to be independent. The control of a mind more steadfast than her own was necessary to her respectability. While she was restrained by her husband, a man of sense and firmness, indulgent to her taste in trifles, but always the undisputed master of his house, her worst offences had been impertinent jokes, white lies, and short fits of pettishness, ending in sunny good-humor. But he was gone, and she was left an opulent widow of forty, with strong sensibility, volatile fancy, and slender judgment. She soon fell in love with a music-master from Brescia, in whom nobody but herself could discover anything to admire. Her pride, and perhaps some better feelings, struggled hard against this degrading passion. But the struggle irritated her nerves, soured her temper, and at length endangered her health. Conscious that her choice was one which Johnson could not approve, she became desirous to escape from his inspection. Her manner towards him changed. She was sometimes cold and sometimes petulant. She did not conceal her joy when he left Streatham ; she never pressed him to return ; and, if he came unbidden, she received him in a manner which convinced him that he was no longer a welcome guest. He took the very intelligible hints which she gave. He read, for the last time, a chapter of the Greek Testament in the library which had been ormed by himself. In a solemn and tender prayer he ommended the house and its inmates to the Divine rotection, and, with emotions which choked his voice nd convulsed his powerful frame, left forever that eloved home for the gloomy and desolate house behind leet Street, where the few and evil days which still emained to him were to run out. Here, in June, 1783, e had a paralytic stroke, from which, however, he re-overed, and which does not appear to have at all im-aired his intellectual faculties. But other maladies ame thick upon him. His asthma tormented him day nd night. Dropsical symptoms made their appear-nce. While sinking under a complication of diseases, e heard that the woman whose friendship had been he chief happiness of sixteen years of his life had narried an Italian fiddler ; that all London was crying hame upon her ; and that the newspapers and maga-ines were filled with allusions to the Ephesian matron nd the two pictures in "Hamlet." He vehemently aid that he would try to forget her existence. He ever uttered her name. Every memorial of her which net his eye he flung into the fire. She meanwhile fled rom the laughter and hisses of her countrymen and ountrywomen to a land where she was unknown, astened across Mount Cenis, and learned, while passing merry Christmas of concerts and lemonade parties at Milan, that the great man with whose name hers is nseparably associated had ceased to exist.

52. He had, in spite of much mental and much odily affliction, clung vehemently to life. The feeling described in that fine but gloomy paper which closes the series of his Idlers, seemed to grow stronger in him as his last hour drew near. He fancied that he should be able to draw his breath more easily in a southern climate, and would probably have set out for Rome and Naples but for his fear of the expense of the journey. That expense, indeed, he had the means of defraying; for he had laid up about two thousand pounds, the fruit of labors which had made the fortune of several publishers. But he was unwilling to break in upon this hoard, and he seems to have wished even to keep its existence a secret. Some of his friends hoped that the government might be induced to increase his pension to six hundred pounds a year; but this hope was disappointed, and he resolved to stand one English winter more. That winter was his last. His legs grew weaker; his breath grew shorter; the fatal water gathered fast, in spite of incisions which he, courageous against pain, but timid against death, urged his surgeons to make deeper and deeper. Though the tender care which had mitigated his sufferings during months of sickness at Streatham was withdrawn, he was not left desolate. The ablest physicians and surgeons attended him, and refused to accept fees from him. Burke parted from him with deep emotion. Windham sat much in the sick-room, arranged the pillows, and sent his own servant to watch at night by the bed. Frances Burney, whom the old man had cherished with fatherly kindness, stood weeping at the door; while Langton, whose piety eminently qualified him to be an adviser and mforter at such a time, received the last pressure of s friend's hand within. When at length the moment, eaded through so many years, came close, the dark oud passed away from Johnson's mind. His temper came unusually patient and gentle ; he ceased to ink with terror of death, and of that which lies beyond ath ; and he spoke much of the mercy of God, and of e propitiation of Christ. In this serene frame of ind he died on the 13th of December, 1784. He was d, a week later, in Westminster Abbey, among the inent men of whom he had been the historian, — owley and Denham, Dryden and Congreve, Gay, ior, and Addison.

53. Since his death, the popularity of his works — e "Lives of the Poets," and, perhaps, the "Vanity Human Wishes," excepted — has greatly diminished. s Dictionary has been altered by editors till it can arcely be called his. An allusion to his Rambler or s Idler is not readily apprehended in literary circles. ne fame even of "Rasselas" has grown somewhat n. But though the celebrity of the writings may ve declined, the celebrity of the writer, strange to y, is as great as ever. Boswell's book has done for n more than the best of his own books could do. The emory of other authors is kept alive by their works. ut the memory of Johnson keeps many of his works ve. The old philosopher is still among us in the own coat with the metal buttons, and the shirt which ght to be at wash, blinking, puffing, rolling his head, umming with his fingers, tearing his meat like a tiger, and swallowing his tea in oceans. No human beir who has been more than seventy years in the grave so well known to us. And it is but just to say that ou intimate acquaintance with what he would himse have called the anfractuosities of his intellect and of h temper, serves only to strengthen our conviction tha he was both a great and a good man.

NOTES

Paragraph 1

Sovereigns in possession, Jacobite, royal touch. At the death Queen Elizabeth in 1603, the Stuart family of Scotland suceded to the English throne in the person of James VI, who came James I of England. The Stuart line, James I, Charles I, harles II, and James II, were unsuited by temper and principles their English people. They adhered to the doctrine of the dine right of kings, recently made infamous by the German Kaiser; ey believed in short that they were divinely appointed and re responsible solely to God and not at all to the people whom ey ruled. A corollary of this belief was that they received m God the power of healing certain diseases by a mere laying of hands (through a gold coin), hence, the royal touch. The sease most commonly treated in this fashion was scrofula, hich came to be called the "King's evil." James II, the last the Stuart line, succeeded his brother in 1685. He was so goted and arbitrary that in 1688 he was driven from England the Revolution; William of Orange and James II's daughter, ary, became king and queen respectively. Oaths of allegiance the new line, the sovereigns in possession, were required of embers of Parliament, the clergy, and all office holders. Adrents of the Stuart family after the Revolution were called cobites (from Jacobus, the Latin for James).

Attic. Practically equivalent to Athenian. Athens, the intellectual center of Greece, was situated in the district of Attica.

Augustan delicacy of taste. That refinement of taste in art d literature which characterized the reign of Emperor Augustus 1 B.C.-14 A.D.). The Augustan Age was the most illustrious Roman literature; in it Virgil, Horace, Ovid, and Livy lived d wrote. The term Augustan Age is applied to period of like inement in other literatures. Thus the reign of Quen Anne often called the Augustan Age in English literature.

Great public schools of England; sixth form at Eton. The English public schools are in no way like the public schools the United States. They are public only in the sense that the are not conducted for private profit. Like our great preparato schools, they are not supported by the state but by tuition fe and the income from endowments. They prepare chiefly for t great universities, and still devote themselves mostly to Gre and Latin. There are generally six classes, known as forms, t sixth form being the highest. Eton, Harrow, Rugby, and Wes minster are among the most famous of these schools. A priva school in England is one owned by individuals and general run for a profit.

Restorers of learning ; Petrarch. In the fourteenth centu there arose in Italy a great revival of interest in Greek and Roma literature and art called the Renaissance. Chief among t restorers of learning were Petrarch and Boccacio. Petrarch h been called the father of the revival of learning. He is no famous chiefly for his exquisite Italian sonnets ; his Latin wor are now little read. In the fifteenth century, the movement w stimulated by the invention of printing, by the discovery America, and by the capture of Constantinople by the Tur in 1453, which drove the Grecian scholars to Europe. In t sixteenth century, the movement spread through Franc England, and Germany.

PARAGRAPHS 2 AND 3

Either university ; Pembroke College, Oxford ; rulers of th society ; Christ Church ; gentleman commoner. The gre English universities at Oxford and Cambridge are quite diffe ently constituted from ours. Instead of our undergradua colleges, and graduate and professional schools, they are co posed only of allied colleges, each separately endowed and se governed. The rulers of each college are the master and fellow The fellows and the undergraduates known as scholars are su ported by yearly payments from the college endowment. St dents who pay their own expenses, including board at the co mons (common eating-table), are called commoners. A gent man commoner was a term applied in Johnson's day to the high class of commoners, who by paying larger fees received spec privileges. Pembroke College, Oxford, chiefly notable for Joh son's having attended it, was founded in 1624. The colle possesses his teapot, and the desk on which he wrote his di tionary. The portrait of him by Reynolds, the celebrated En lish painter, hangs in the common room. Christ Church one of the wealthiest of the Oxford colleges. It was founded

rdinal Wolsey in 1524, and numbers among its graduates ng Edward VII, the Duke of Wellington, and Gladstone.

Macrobius. An obscure Roman grammarian of the fifth ıtury A.D. Though only the classical scholar of to-day would ow even the name of Macrobius, Johnson's becoming interested his works is not surprising, for the Saturnalia, the most imrtant of his books, contains "a great variety of curious hisrical, mythological, critical, and grammatical disquisitions."

Pope's "Messiah." In 1712, three years after Johnson's birth, ddison and Steele's Spectator published Pope's Messiah, a igious pastoral in imitation of Virgil's Fourth Eclogue. An logue is a short dialogue in verse between shepherds.

Virgilian. Resembling the style of Virgil, generally classed as e greatest Latin poet, the author of The Aeneid. He wrote ring the Augustan Age, and was a great admirer of the Emror Augustus. Virgilian connotes perfection of art and masty of expression.

Paragraph 6

Gilbert Walmesley. A jurist of no mean ability to whom hnson was more indebted than this paragraph would indicate.
esides receiving Johnson constantly in his home and writing the tters mentioned in ¶ 9, Walmesley stocked Johnson's mind
th much information, especially concerning literary men, that ter was of much use (Cf. ¶ 16). Johnson said of him many ars later: "Such was his amplitude of learning, and such his piousness of communication, that it may be doubted whether day now passes, in which I have not some advantage from his endship."

Ecclesiastical court of the diocese. In England to the end of e seventeenth century, nearly to the birth of Johnson, there isted besides the regular king's courts a system of ecclesiastical urts, which had jurisdiction over "spiritual offences," including ch matters as perjury, adultery, and divorce. In Johnson's me, however, their jurisdiction had been restricted practically matters of church discipline.

Usher of a grammar school. The English grammar school is ie in which college preparatory work is done. It got its name om the fact that for centuries Greek and Latin were the chief, not the sole, studies. The great English public schools like ton and Rugby are properly grammar schools, though the term generally applied to the smaller endowed institutions. An sher was in Johnson's time a submaster or assistant teacher.

Latin book about Abyssinia. Johnson had read at Pembroke

a French translation of an account by a Portuguese Jesuit, Lobo of a voyage to Abyssinia. Macaulay is therefore wrong in callin it a Latin book. Johnson's translation from the French int English is of interest because it is our first example of his pros style and because it probably suggested the setting of his Rasse las.

Politian. One of the most brilliant scholars and restorers o learning in Italy in the fifteenth century. His patron, Lorenz de' Medici, the autocrat of Florence and the chief patron o learning in Italy, took Politian into his house, made him tut of his children, and secured for him a position in the Universit at Florence.

Paragraph 7

This paragraph is a striking example of Macaulay's exaggera tions and inaccuracies. Nearly every statement in the firs half of it is open to question. Mrs. Porter's children were muc younger than Johnson. His description of her is the one give by Garrick, who, according to Boswell, considerably aggravate the picture. Johnson was not unacquainted with women of re fashion : " In these families he [Johnson] passed much time i his early years. In most of them he was in the company o ladies, particularly at Mr. Walmsley's, whose wife and sister in-law, of the name of Aston, and daughters of a baronet, we remarkable for good breeding." (Boswell, under 1732, Julii 15 Johnson did not call his wife Titty but Tetty, which, like Bett was a common abbreviation for Elizabeth. She was not so poo as he : she possessed a small fortune of about £800, with whic he established the academy at Edial.

Queensberrys and Lepels. Macaulay always preferred th concrete term to the abstract one. Though Mary Lepel, wh became Lady Hervey, and Catherine Hyde, afterwards Duche of Queensberry, were doubtless familiar enough to Macaulay a prominent women of fashion in Johnson's time, they mean litt to-day except to one who happens to have read the letters o Swift and Pope.

Paragraph 8

David Garrick (1717–1779). Leading English actor of Johr son's time. Among the best families of Lichfield was that o Captain Garrick, whose sons became two of Johnson's thre pupils at Edial. One of them, David, accompanied Johnson t London to study law.

Paragraph 10

Besides Scott and Macaulay himself, Byron, Dickens and hackeray might be mentioned as authors of the nineteenth ntury who made large sums from the sale of their books to the ublic.

Thomson, James (1700–1784). A Scottish poet and one of the oneers of the new romantic school. His best-known poems, beides The Seasons, are Rule Britannia and The Castle of Indolence. he Seasons is, as its title indicates, a description of the sights and ounds of the changing year. Thomson was among the first to oandon the heroic couplet, and to go back to the Elizabethans stead of to Pope for models.

Fielding, Henry (1707–1754). The greatest English novelist the eighteenth century. Richardson, the first novelist, proiced in Pamela a heroine of such false sentimentality and moraling virtue that Fielding determined to write a burlesque of it. e became so interested in his hero, Joseph Andrews, that dropped the burlesque and wrote for the joy of writing. he book was so well received that he gave up the writing plays and farces, and devoted to the novel what time he uld spare from his duties as a magistrate in breaking up the ngs of ruffians and thieves that infested the streets of London night. Pasquin is a popular burlesque criticizing the political rruption of the Walpole era. Fielding's style is coarse, even lgar, but it is natural and vigorous. His best novel is Tom mes.

"The Beggars' Opera." A burlesque satire written in 1728 by hn Gay. Like Pasquin, it was a satire on English society and litical institutions. In particular it was a caricature of Sir obert Walpole. It was a lyrical drama, the characters of hich were in large part thieves and highwaymen.

Paragraph 11

Drury Lane. A famous street in London — famous chiefly r being the site of the Drury Lane Theater, of which Garrick ecame manager in 1747 ; Johnson wrote a prologue for him.

Paragraph 12

Subterranean ordinaries and à la mode beef shops. An ordiry was a restaurant where meals were served at fixed — nerally low — prices, like our table d'hôte ; an à la mode beef op was a restaurant specializing in beef "larded and stewed, braised with spices, vegetables, etc."

Osborne ; Harleian Library. Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford and one of Queen Anne's prime ministers accumulated a vast private library. After his death the manuscripts were bought by the government and are in the British Museum. The books were sold to Osborne, the bookseller, who employed Johnson to write the introduction and the Latin items of his five-volume catalogue of the library.

PARAGRAPH 13

Cave ; "Gentleman's Magazine." Edward Cave (1691–1754) was an English printer whose chief fame lies in his establishing of the Gentleman's Magazine in 1731. It has had a long and prosperous career. The addition of Samuel Johnson to the staff was one of Cave's most fortunate acts. Johnson's first contribution was an ode in Latin to Cave himself. Among his later was a biographical sketch of Cave after the latter's death. Cave also published Johnson's Life of Savage and The Rambler.

Senate of Lilliput ; Duke of Newcastle ; Lord Hardwicke ; William Pulteney. Robert Walpole was for twenty-one years (1721–1742) undisputed ruler of England. Enemies he had in plenty, for he was unscrupulous in method and jealous in temper. William Pulteney, afterwards Earl of Bath, was among Walpole's discarded friends. From that time until Walpole's fall in 1742 Pulteney remained one of his bitterest opponents. He was exceeded in violence of bitterness only by Swift, whose Gulliver's Travels was really a satire upon England. The description in Gulliver's Travels of the intrigues at the court of Blefuscu in the kingdom of Lilliput, in which the statesmen obtain favor by cutting capers on a tight rope before their sovereign, was nothing more nor less than an attack upon Walpole's policy. Upon Walpole's fall, Pulteney tried unsuccessfully to form a cabinet. A coalition ministry was then organized with the Duke of Newcastle as Secretary of State and Lord Hardwicke as Lord Chancellor.

Tory ; Whigs. See Introduction, § 28.

Capulets ; Montagues. Two noble families of Verona, Italy, in the fourteenth century. A deadly feud, the source of which lay in the "mere passion" of irrational pride, had long existed between the two families. In Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet Juliet is a Capulet and Romeo a Montague. The death of the lovers brought an end to the feud.

Blues of the Roman Circus against the Greens. The drivers in the chariot races at Rome were distinguished by the color of their liveries. The whole population took sides, and the contest

f chariots within the circus was often followed by a contest f partisans outside it. This rivalry often resulted in bloodshed ; housands were slain in the great "Nika" riot.

Sacheverell. A famous Tory clergyman in the time of Queen nne. In 1710 he preached two sermons in which he contended hat the church was in danger from the Whigs. He attacked the Vhig leader, Godolphin, and proclaimed the principle of the ivine right of kings. Godolphin urged Sacheverell's impeach- ient by the House of Commons. He was found guilty, but opular sympathy rallied about him as a martyr. The Whigs ere defeated in the next election.

Tom Tempest. An absurdly extreme Jacobite in Johnson's dler, No. 10. "Tom Tempest is a steady friend to the house of tuart. He can recount the prodigies that have appeared in the ky, and the calamities that have afflicted the nation every year rom the Revolution ; and is of the opinion that if the exiled amily [the Stuarts] had continued to reign there would have either been worms in our ships nor caterpillars in our trees."

Laud ; Hampden ; ship money ; Falkland ; Clarendon ; Roundheads. Charles I, the second of the Stuart kings, con- inued his father's policy of personal rule, and insisted upon the octrine of divine right. Chief among his advisers was William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury. Bigoted and unscrupulous, Laud was ; but Macaulay is certainly wrong in calling him "a poor creature," for he was most able. He stopped at nothing o crush the Roundheads, as the Puritans were called, because hey wore their hair cropped close to distinguish themselves from he vain and worldly Cavaliers with their long curls. One of Charles's devices for raising money without resorting to Parlia- ient was the levying of ship money. Theoretically this was a ax levied upon seaports in time of war for their defence. Charles evied it upon all the towns in the kingdom and in times of peace. John Hampden, a wealthy gentleman and member of Parliament, efused to pay his tax of twenty shillings to test the legality of the aw. The Court of the Exchequer ruled against him by a vote f seven to five. Charles, however, failed to secure sufficient ncome by such means and was compelled to summon Parliament gain. The first lasted three weeks and was dissolved. The econd, immediately after being called, passed a bill depriving he king of his power of dissolving Parliament, and sat for over wenty years, thus getting the name of the Long Parliament. t then proceeded to release from prison all those put there by Charles ; to punish Charles's ministers and advisers, the two hief ones, Strafford and Laud, being executed ; and to limit the powers of the king. The leaders of the moderates in the Long Parliament were Viscount Falkland and the Earl of Clarendon. Their sympathies were at first with the Puritans, but when the final break with Charles came, they joined him, and fought on his side against Cromwell. Clarendon lived to see the restoration and was for seven years prime minister under Charles II.

Dissenters and stockjobbers ; the excise and the army ; septennial parliaments, and continental connections. All terms connected with the hated Whigs. The dissenters, nonconformists, were Whigs because the Established Church clergy were a strong element in the Tory party ; the stock-jobbers — commercial classes — were Whigs because the nobility and the wealthy gentry of the country were Tories ; the excise tax was an internal revenue duty of Walpole, a Whig ; septennial parliaments (parliaments lasting seven years instead of three as formerly) were secured by a Whig measure ; continental connections were retained by George I, who was a German, the Elector of Hanover and had Whig sympathies.

Aversion to the Scotch ; Great Rebellion. Macaulay is wrong in his interpretation that Johnson hated the Scotch because in the Great Rebellion (the Puritan revolution) they had turned Charles I over to Cromwell and his associates. Boswell once said to Johnson, "Old Mr. Sheridan says, it [' your antipathy to the Scotch '] was because they sold Charles I." "Then, sir," Johnson replied, "old Mr. Sheridan has found out a very good reason." But Johnson did not wish to imply that such was the right reason. Boswell believed that Johnson hated the Scotch in reality "probably owing to his having had in his view the worst part of the Scottish nation, the needy adventurers, many of whom he thought were advanced above their merits by means which he did not approve." Johnson himself "candidly admitted that he could not tell the reason." His prejudice disappeared almost completely in later years.

Johnson's integrity is often questioned because of the deceit he practised upon the public in the reports of the parliamentary debates. As a matter of fact, he said later "that as soon as he found that the speeches were thought genuine, he determined that he would write no more of them ; for 'he would not be accessory to the propagation of falsehood.'"

Paragraph 14

Pope ; Horace ; Johnson ; Juvenal. All satirists, of varying degrees of bitterness. Horace was the leading lyric poet of the Augustan Age in Rome. His most famous works are the Odes odes, Satires, and Epistles. He had as a patron the wealthy ıecenas, and lived a life of ease. He ridiculed urbanely the ıbles of fashionable Rome. Alexander Pope had in common ıh Horace the fact that he was in easy circumstances and was e friend of the great. He had also paraphrased very freely his Imitations of Horace two of the Satires and four Epistles. t he lacked Horace's urbanity ; indeed in personality the two re quite unlike. Pope was deformed, dwarfish in body and ıl, lacking in kind feeling, jealous, waspish. Juvenal lived out one hundred years after Horace and in the time of Rome's eatest moral degradation. His satires are not good-humored icule of foibles ; they are bitter, scornful railing at the des- tism and lust and inhuman cruelties of Domitian and Nero, audius and Messalina ; at the loss of the old national manliness d self-respect among all the Romans. The common quality Johnson and Juvenal was the bitterness of tone, the gloominess view, with which each wrote. Juvenal did not suffer the verty and physical privations of Johnson, yet he was prac- ally exiled in his old age. Juvenal, too, had much more hor- le things to write about than the sufferings of men of letters d the vanity of human wishes, the chief burdens of Johnson's ires. Though the parallel in each case is not perfect, there enough similarity to give point to Pope's being called the English Horace" and Johnson's being given the title of "the odern Juvenal."

Paragraph 15

Pope, with great kindness. Pope's treatment of Johnson was rtainly unlike his usual attitude toward a literary rival. He s exceedingly vain, and most jealous of his prerogatives as e leading poet of the time. His Dunciad (Iliad of the Dunces) a literary expression in a coarse and vengeful satire of his petty te toward those who criticized him or showed a lack of appre- iation of his genius. Perhaps Pope's kindness to Johnson was e to the fact that they had common literary principles. Dry- n was the first great literary dictator of the classical school, pe the second, and Johnson the last. Dryden established the roic couplet (iambic pentameter lines riming in pairs) ; Pope rfected it ; Johnson defended it. More probably, however, pe's kindness to Johnson was due to the latter's openly ex- ssed admiration for him. Johnson paid him the compliment translating his Messiah into Latin verse, and Pope replied by marking that the translator made it "a question for posterity, ether his or mine be the original."

Bookseller's hack. One who for hire does mechanical literar work such as the compiling of indexes and the annotating another's writings.

PARAGRAPH 16

Boyse ; Hoole ; Psalmanazar ; Savage. Johnson seems t have had the club habit. Though Macaulay does not mentio the fact that these early friends of Johnson's were fellow membe of a club, Johnson himself said, " He (John Hoole) was of a clu in Old Street, with me and George Psalmanazar, and son others." It does not seem that this early conglomeration w any less remarkable in its way than the later one called T Literary Club or simply The Club. Concerning the impecunio Irish poet Boyse, the metaphysical tailor Hoole, and that son an Earl, apprentice of a shoemaker, dissolute profligate, ar mediocre poet Richard Savage, Macaulay is explicit enoug George Psalmanazar, however, is interesting enough to deser somewhat further mention. His real name he never disclos even in his memoirs. He was in reality of French birth, but pretended to be a native of Formosa. After a most adventuro career of imposture in Germany and Flanders, he went to Englar and posed as a noble Japanese convert. He was employed the Bishop of London to translate the Anglican catechism in Japanese, of which he had not the slightest knowledge. published in 1704 a fictitious description of Formosa. Wh exposure was inevitable he made a full confession. Of the r mainder of his life Johnson said, " George Psalmanazar's piet penitence, and virtue exceeded almost what we read as wonderf even in the lives of saints." When Boswell asked Johnson if had ever contradicted Psalmanazar, the reply was, " I should soon have thought of contradicting a bishop."

Blue ribands in Saint James's Square. The highest aristo racy of London. St. James's Square has been since it was la out a favorite residence of English aristocracy. The blue ribb is the symbol of the highest order of knighthood in Englan the Order of the Garter. According to legend, the order w originated by Edward III about 1350.

Newgate. A famous old prison in London several times r built, razed in 1902, and now replaced by another.

Piazza of Covent Garden. Covent (Convent) Garden is a lar square in London originally the garden of the convent at Wes minster. It has long been noted for its vegetable, flower, a fruit market, and for the Covent Garden Theater. In Johnson time the Garden was the scene of great football matches. T azza was an arcade or covered walk planned by the famous nglish architect Inigo Jones in imitation of Italian models. It s burned in part and remains only on the north and east sides the square.

The Prime Minister. Sir Robert Walpole, of course. Cf. tes on ¶ 13 and Introduction, § 46.

Paragraph 17

Grub Street. Now Milton Street; according to Johnson's ictionary, "the name of a street in London, much inhabited writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary writers; nence any mean production is called Grub-street."

Paragraph 18

Warburton. Bishop of Gloucester, a kind of clerical Johnson t arrogant and supercilious. He had his Boswell in Bishop urd, but Warburton and Hurd are to-day insignificant beside hnson and Boswell.

Paragraph 19

Earl of Chesterfield. "Undisputed sovereign of wit and shion" in Johnson's time. Besides his fame as orator and atesman, he is noted for his Letters to his Son, concerning which hnson said, "Take out the immorality, and it should be put the hands of every young man." But its immorality is much aggerated.

Paragraph 20

Tenth Satire of Juvenal; Wolsey; Sejanus. The theme of ivenal's tenth satire was itself the vanity of human wishes. It illustrated by great historic instances, such as Sejanus and annibal. Sejanus was the favorite and minister of the Emeror Tiberius. He made himself virtually ruler of Rome, and med even higher. He had Tiberius's son, Drusus, poisoned. e set about removing the remaining members of the imperial mily, but Tiberius finally became suspicious. Sejanus formed plot to assassinate his master, but he was betrayed, degraded om his command, seized, and executed. A. D. 31. Johnson used ardinal Wolsey as a parallel instance of the certain punishment greed and arrogant ambition. Wolsey desired to become pope, d plotted to this end in every conceivable way. He enraged e English nobility and lost the confidence of the king, Henry III. Finally, in 1530, he was charged with treason and was mmoned to London. Before he could be tried, he died.

Juvenal's "Hannibal"; Johnson's "Charles." Hannibal was second historic instance used by Juvenal to show the "vani of human wishes." Hannibal's military genius was transcen ent. He was destined by his father to be the instrument Carthaginian vengeance against Rome. In 219 B.C. he march through Gaul and across the Alps into Italy. For seven years he defeated army after army led by the best generals Rome — this in the face of only half-hearted support from C thage. Several times he was on the point of besieging Ro but fortune was against him. After being recalled, he was feated in 202 at Zama near Carthage by Scipio. He then voted himself to deeds of statesmanship, and so succeeded strengthening Carthage that Rome demanded his surren Showing true "Punic faith" (perfidy), his fellow countrym deserted their great genius and he went into exile. In 183 poisoned himself rather than let himself fall into the hands Rome. Johnson's Charles was a parallel modern instance of a gr military genius thwarted through no fault of his own. Cha XII of Sweden was one of the most brilliant generals of mod times. He repeatedly defeated the forces of the famous Russ Tsar, Peter the Great, and was marching on Moscow when relatively small army was surrounded and nearly annihilated Pultowa — in the year of Johnson's birth. Charles took ref with his allies the Turks, but was treacherously treated by th He escaped to Sweden and resumed his brilliant warfare. 1718 he was killed by a random bullet in the siege of a N wegian fortress.

Demosthenes. The greatest orator of Greece, and it is g erally admitted without equal in the world. Biographers deli in telling how painstakingly he trained himself to speak in s of natural impediments: how, with pebbles in his mouth, declaimed against the waves, how he practised speaking w running up hill, how he shaved one side of his head to remove temptation to seek the haunts of men, how he wrote out T cydides eight times to master his style. Among his most fam speeches were the Philippics directed against Philip of Mace In 322 B.C., as a result of his lifelong attempts to preserve At from Macedonian domination, he was condemned to death traitor. He fled and sought asylum in a temple of Posei Finding that his asylum wa to be violated, he took poiso sight of his enemies.

Cicero. The greatest Roman orator and probably second to Demosthenes in the world. He is most famous for his spee against Catiline, who conspired to make himself tyrant of Ro

icero was throughout his life a brilliant though inconsistent upporter of republicanism. He even ventured to attack Julius aesar and Antony. He was proscribed by the Second Triumirate, and slain in 43 A.D.

PARAGRAPH 22

Blank verse. Iambic pentameter unrimed. Johnson, being f the classical school and a follower of Pope, was naturally more t home with the heroic couplet — iambic pentameter with lines med in pairs.

PARAGRAPH 23

"Tatler"; "Spectator"; Addison. Joseph Addison (1672–1719)
as one of the leading figures in the Augustan Age of English terature. His work was twofold : he turned on vice the very ockery it had used against virtue in the days of the Restoration
– he purified English literature and life ; secondly, prompted y the more original genius of Steele, he perfected the familiar ssay in The Tatler and The Spectator. Richard Steele, an responsible but good-hearted, lovable Irishman, originated
he Tatler in 1709, six months before Johnson's birth, and invited ddison to write some of the essays. He also invented the haracter of Sir Roger de Coverley for The Spectator, begun in 711 ; but Addison became particularly interested in the character nd wrote most of the essays about him. The influence of these wo periodicals was most remarkable. There followed a veritable warm of imitations, of which Johnson's Rambler and Idler are he most notable. Addison's style was so distinctive for its ease nd elegance that the adjective Addisonian is used to-day to haracterize a singularly graceful style. Johnson himself said,
"Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not oarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and ights to the volumes of Addison."

PARAGRAPH 24

Richardson, Samuel (1689–1761). The first English novelist· s a boy he had a natural talent for writing letters, and he was ften employed by the girls of the village to write their love etters for them. He thus gained an insight into feminine nature hat later was of much use to him. His reputation as a letter riter grew, and he was finally approached by a group of pubshers with a proposal to write a series of letters to be used as odels. Richardson gladly accepted the proposal and had the appy idea of so connecting the letters to tell the story of a girl's life. The result was the first real English novel, Pamela. Johnson was a great admirer of Richardson's and very much preferred him to Fielding, Richardson's successor and superior.

Young, Edward (1681–1761). A minor English poet, the author of Night Thoughts. He was much admired — by far too much — by Johnson and Boswell.

Hartley, David (1705–1757). An English physician and philosopher. He was one of the first psychologists.

Bubb Dodington. George Bubb Dodington (1691–1762), eminent for his skill in "practical politics." His morals were not above reproach and his political principles were low, but he was a good scholar and a generous patron of literature.

Prince Frederick. Frederick Louis, Prince of Wales, son of George II. He never became king as he died in 1715, nine years before his father. The relations between George II and his son were very unfriendly, the fault not being all on one side. The prince's character was not attractive; the king refused him a fair allowance. Frederick gathered about him all the malcontents and made his court the center of opposition to Walpole. George III was his eldest son.

Paragraph 25

Sir Roger, etc. Characters or incidents in The Spectator.

Squire Bluster and Mrs. Busy, etc. Characters or incidents in The Rambler. It is not quite fair to judge the respective merits of Addison and Johnson by a comparison of the interest in the characters and incidents of the periodicals. The best parts of The Rambler are the serious essays, which won for Johnson the title "The Great Moralist."

Paragraph 26

The Gunnings. Two sisters, Maria and Elizabeth, of humble Irish birth but of great beauty. Maria became Countess of Coventry; Elizabeth, Duchess of Hamilton and later Duchess of Argyle. When Duchess of Argyle she was a hostess of Johnson during his tour in Scotland.

Lady Mary. Lady Mary Wortley Montague (1689–1762), a celebrated letter writer and wit. She had a most romantic life, eloping because her father refused to consent to her marriage, and later carrying on sentimental correspondence with Pope and others. She was the first to introduce inoculation for small pox, a practice with which she became familiar at Constantinople while her husband was ambassador there.

Pit of Drury Lane Theater. In England originally that part of ıe theater around the stage in which the "groundlings" — tisans, mechanics, apprentices, and the like — stood. Adission to this part of the theater was very cheap, and the judg-ents from it were therefore those of the people. The name pit" is now used in England for the cheap seats on the floor ehind the stalls. The Drury Lane Theater was among the most mous in London. Garrick became manager of it in 1747.

"Monthly Review." A critical periodical having a continuous istence of about 100 years (1749–1845). It was strongly Whig ıd nonconformist and therefore quite disapproved of by John-
n. There is an interesting account in Boswell's report of ohnson's interview with the King (George III). "The King en asked him if there were any other literary journals pub-shed in this kingdom, except the Monthly and Critical Reviews, ıd on being answered that there was no other, his Majesty ked which of them was the best; Johnson answered that the Monthly Review was done with most care, the Critical upon the st principles; adding, that the authors of the Monthly Review ere enemies of the church."

PARAGRAPH 27

In a letter. This famous letter to Chesterfield has been called e Declaration of Independence or Magna Charta of authorship.
fter Chesterfield's two papers in The World appeared, Johnson id to Garrick, "I have sailed a long and painful voyage round e world of the English language; and does he now send out two ck-boats to tow me into harbor?" Boswell gives us a copy the celebrated letter.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD

February 7, 1755.

My Lord: — I have been lately informed, by the proprietor of The World, that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your Lordship. To be so distinguished, is an honour which, being very little accustomed to favours from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your Lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address, and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre; — that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending ; but I found my attendance so little encouraged, that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your Lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could ; and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

Seven years, my Lord, have now past, since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door ; during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it, at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a Patron before.

The shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks.

Is not a Patron, my Lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help ? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind ; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it ; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it ; till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity, not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the Public should consider me as owing that to a Patron which Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

Having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favourer of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less ; for I have been long wakened from that dream of hope, in which I once boasted myself with so much exultation,

My Lord,
Your Lordship's most humble,
Most obedient servant,
SAM. JOHNSON

Horne Tooke. John Horne Tooke (1736–1812), a combativ and energetic English curate, politician, and philologist. H was the son of John Horne, a poulterer, whom he ingenuousl described in school as a Turkey merchant. He adopted the nam Tooke in 1782, in honor of his friend William Tooke, who ha promised to make him his heir. Horne Tooke early abandone the ministry for the exciting career of supporting unpopular an dical persons and causes. He was for some years a supporter the notorious John Wilkes. He secured for the public the ght of printing the debates in Parliament (1771). He was com- itted to prison for his support of the American cause in the evolution. Nearly twenty years later he was accused of eason for aiding the French revolutionaries, but was quickly quitted. His conversational powers rivaled those of Dr. ohnson, but he was not so fortunate as to have a Boswell.

Paragraph 28

Junius and Skinner. Franz Junius (1589–1677), was a Hugue- ot scholar born of a French father and a German mother. He as born and educated in Germany, but at the age of thirty he migrated to England, where he spent most of his remaining ears. He devoted himself to the study of Anglo-Saxon and the lated Old Teutonic languages. His best-known work is the tymologicum Anglicanum, an etymological dictionary of the nglish language. Stephen Skinner (1623-1707) was a graduate Christ Church, Oxford. He published an etymological die- onary of the English language in 1671. Johnson said of their ctionaries in the preface of his own, "Junius appears to have celled in extent of learning, and Skinner in rectitude of under- anding."

Paragraph 29

Spunging-houses. "A house to which debtors are taken be- re commitment to prison, where the bailiffs sponge upon them, riot at their cost," according to Johnson's own definition.

Jenyns' "Inquiry." Soame Jenyns (1709–1787) was an English uthor owing his literary reputation during his lifetime as much his wealth and social position as to his ability. Johnson con- emned his Inquiry as a "slight and shallow attempt to solve ne of the most difficult of moral problems."

Paragraph 32

Miss Lydia Languish. A character in Sheridan's famous omedy, The Rivals, noted for her insipid sentimentality. Her hief interest in life lay in the reading of sickly sentimental novels, e characters of which she used as a model for her own conversa- on and actions.

Paragraph 33

Rasselas and Imlac; Nekayah and Pekuah. The two chief ale and the two chief female characters respectively of Rasselas.

Rasselas was Prince of Abyssinia ; Imlac was an old sage, th teacher of the prince and princess ; Nekayah was the princes the sister of Rasselas ; Pekuah was the attendant of the princess

Newton. Sir Isaac Newton (1642–1727), eminent Englis natural philosopher and mathematician. His researches and dis coveries in physics and astronomy were most original. He i popularly connected with the story of the apple tree and the la of gravitation. Dr. Johnson had a great admiration for Newto and remarked at one time "that if Newton had flourished i ancient Greece, he would have been worshipped as a divinity."

"Bruce's Travels." James Bruce (1730 1794), a Scotch ex plorer. He was the first of the three greatest African explorers anticipating the second, Livingstone, by seventy years and th third, Stanley, by one hundred. In his famous journey (1770- 1772) through Abyssinia, Bruce determined the course of the Blu Nile. Johnson said that "when he first conversed with Mr Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, he was very much inclined t believe he had been there ; but that he had afterwards altere his opinion."

Mrs. Lennox. Charlotte Lennox (1720-1804), a minor Englis novelist and poet. She is the author of a novel still widely known by name but not much read, The Female Quixote. She was o American birth, being the daughter of Colonel James Ramsey at one time lieutenant-governor of New York. Johnson had a very great admiration for her, and crowned her with laurel at a all-night supper planned by him in honor of her first novel.

Mrs. Sheridan. Mrs. Frances Sheridan (1724–1766), th mother of the famous dramatist and herself a novelist an dramatist of some ability. She wrote a two-volume novel whe she was only fifteen. Her best-known play, The Discovery, wa one of Garrick's favorites, and he revived it at the Drury Lan as a counter attraction to her son's The Rivals, when the latte was put on at the Covent Garden Theater. Johnson said to he concerning her best novel, Memoirs of Miss Sydney Biddulph "I know not, madam, that you have a right, upon moral prin ciples, to make your readers suffer so much."

Hector quote Aristotle. Troilus and Cressida, Act II, Scene 2 lines 163–166 —

> "Hector. — Paris and Troilus, you have both said well,
> . . . . . .
> . . . but superficially ; not much
> Unlike young men, whom Aristotle thought > Unfit to hear moral philosophy."

Hector. Son of King Priam of Troy. He was the leading warrior on his side at the siege of Troy. When Achilles, the champion of the Greeks, retired from the siege in anger at Agamemnon, the Greek general, Hector drove the Greeks back to their ship and killed Patroclus, Achilles's friend. Then Achilles, to revenge his friend, returned to the conflict, slew Hector, dragged his body behind his chariot around Troy to his tent, and bound the tomb of Patroclus. The siege of Troy is supposed to have taken place in the twelfth century B.C.

Aristotle. Great Greek philosopher, 384–322 B.C. His writings upon logic, physics, biology, ethics, politics, poetics, rhetoric, and metaphysics have been the chief source of modern culture. He lived roughly eight centuries after Hector. Such a lack of consistency in time is called an anachronism.

Julio Romano . . . the oracle of Delphi. Guilio Romano (1492–1546) was a prolific Italian painter, modeler, architect, and engineer. He was the ablest of Raphael's pupils and completed some of the Master's undertakings in the Vatican. The temple of the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, the most revered of ancient Grecian oracles, was closed near the end of the fourth century B.C. by Emperor Theodosius. The anachronism referred to is to be found in A Winter's Tale. The action of the play is supposed to have taken place in the time of Guilio, who lived 1200 years after the oracle was closed; yet the judgment of the oracle at Delphi is sought. (Act II, Scene 1, line 182ff.)

Paragraph 34

Lord Privy Seal. A member of the British cabinet having in his custody the Privy Seal; this seal must be affixed to nearly all state papers in the United Kingdom except those of major importance, which bear the Great Seal. Lord Gower is the minister referred to: Johnson said to Boswell, "You know, Sir, Lord Gower forsook the old Jacobite interest. When I came to the word renegado, after telling that it meant 'one who deserts to the enemy, a revolter,' I added, 'Sometimes we say a Gower.' Thus it went to the press; but the printer had more wit than I had struck it out."

George the Third; the city; Oxford; Cavendishes and Lentincks; Somersets and Windhams; Lord Bute. George I and George II had been more German princes than British kings. They were quite content to allow Walpole and his successor to do the actual governing. George III, the grandson of George II and son of the ill-fated Frederick Louis (cf. ¶ 24, note), had altogether different ideas. He was young (only twenty-two), thoroughly English, and determined to rule as well as to reig

He was resolved that he would not be controlled by the auto cratic Whig families, as his predecessors had been, and tha
he would break down the system of cabinet and party govern ment. Such a policy was thoroughly Tory, for the Whigs ha always represented the principle of Parliamentary supremacy
The city of London being largely industrial and commercial, wa strongly Whig (cf. Introduction) and " was becoming mutinous.
The university at Oxford, which had been a hotbed of Tory senti ment since 1688, " was becoming loyal." All the Whigs, eve those of great families like the Cavendishes and Bentincks, whic had helped to place his family on the throne, George III bega forcing out of office. Such inveterate Tory families as th Somersets and Wyndhams hastened to his support. The grea Whig prime minister, William Pitt, the elder, was forced to resig and a Scotchman, Lord Bute, the king's friend and adviser an former tutor, was appointed in his place. Bute was as unpopula as Pitt was popular, and not without reason.' As administrato and statesman he was hopelessly weak and unqualified. He wa able to withstand the general animosity of all England for onl a year. Yet Bute was not without personal merits. He ha strong feelings of loyalty and affection for George III, and he wa greatly esteemed in the circle of his family and among intimat friends. He was exceptionally well read, had refined tastes i art and literature, and was a botanist of considerable ability.

PARAGRAPH 36

Cock Lane Ghost. A famous imposture which excited Londo in 1762. The eleven-year-old daughter of a man named Parsons who lived on Cock Lane, told of hearing scratchings and rapping upon the walls of her bedroom. A luminous figure, the ghost of certain woman who had died in the house two years previously was reported. Upon investigation the whole story was found to be a fraud practised by the Parsons family to throw suspicion for purposes of blackmail on Kent, the husband of the sup posedly murdered woman. Parsons was arrested and con demned to the pillory. Dr. Johnson was one of the investigators of the mystery, and assisted in detecting the cheat. Boswel contends that Johnson was never deceived, but Johnson got very angry when Boswell pressed him for details, possibly because he felt he had little to be proud of in the affair.

Churchill. Charles Churchill (1731-1764), a minor English poet and a rancorous satirist of dissolute character. He seems to have been a most loyal friend, but a most bitter enemy. No nvective was too personal or too shocking for his use. His most notable work was The Rosciad, a keen satire upon the actresses nd actors of his day, Garrick alone among the latter escaping idicule. The poem mentioned in the text was entitled The Ghost. Johnson is caricatured in Book II, line 653–688, beginning

> "Pomposo, insolent and loud,
> Vain idol of a scribbling crowd,
> Whose very name inspires an awe,
> Whose ev'ry word is Sense and Law."

The accusation of cheating is to be found in Book III, line 801ff.

> "He for subscribers baits his hook,
> And takes their cash: but where's the book?
> No matter where; wise fear, we know,
> Forbids the robbing of a foe;
> But what, to serve our private ends,
> Forbids the cheating of our friends?"

PARAGRAPH 37

Polonius. A character in Hamlet, the Court Chamberlain, he father of Laertes and Ophelia, and the mouthpiece for the amous precepts beginning,

> "Give thy thoughts no tongue, > Nor any unproportion'd thought his act."

ohnson wrote in part, "Polonius is a man bred in courts, exersed in business, stored with observations, confident of his nowledge, proud of his eloquence, and declining to dotage."

Wilhelm Meister. The hero of Goethe's famous novel, Wilelm Meister's Apprenticeship. Macaulay was a very great adirer of the criticism of the character of Hamlet there expressed. n part, Meister is made to say, "To me it is clear that Shakeeare meant, in the present case, to represent the effects of a reat action laid upon a soul unfit for the performance of it. here is an oak-tree planted in a costly jar, which should have orne only pleasant flowers in its bosom: the roots expand, the r is shivered."

Ben. Ben Jonson (1574–1637), the greatest of Shakespeare's ccessors (though only ten years younger, Jonson survived hakespeare twenty-one years), as Marlowe was the greatest of s predecessors among the Elizabethan dramatists. Jonson was noted for his learning as Shakespeare for his natural genius.

He was a classicist, and fought for the old classical rules, the unities of time, place, and action. The triumph of his and of the French influence culminated in the classical movement of the eighteenth century, of which Dryden, Pope, and Johnson were the chief exponents. Jonson's best works were his comedies Volpone or the Fox, The Alchemist, The Silent Woman, and his masques in honor of James I and Queen Anne such as The Masque of Beauty and The Masque of Queens. Jonson died twenty-one years after Shakespeare, and his death was mourned as a national calamity — unlike Shakespeare's. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. On the marble slab over his grave were engraved the words always associated with him : "O rare Ben Jonson."

Aeschylus ; Euripides ; Sophocles. The three great tragedians of ancient Greece. Aeschylus, born about 525 B.C., was the oldest and Euripides, born about 480 B.C. the youngest. Sophocles was fifteen years older than Euripides. The three were rivals in the famous Age of Pericles, which is to Greek history and literature what the Age of Elizabeth is to English. A full understanding of Sophocles could not be complete without a knowledge of Aeschylus and Euripides.

Massinger, Ford, Decker, Webster, Marlowe, Beaumont or Fletcher. All dramatists and, with the exception of Marlowe, Shakespeare's successors. Christopher Marlowe (1564–1593) was born in the same year as Shakespeare ; yet he died before Shakespeare had really begun his career as dramatist. Had he lived to full maturity, one cannot say what he might not have accomplished. He was the son of a poor shoemaker, and his short life was full of violence and excesses. In his twenty-ninth year he was stabbed in a drunken brawl and died as wretchedly as he had lived. He is noted for four tragedies, all of a type which has been named after him Marlowesque : each revolves about a single dominant personality who is a man consumed by lust of power. These tragedies were Tamburlaine, Faustus, The Jew of Malta, and Edward II. Concerning the other dramatists who all followed Shakespeare, nothing in particular need be said except that they indicate the very rapid decline of the drama : none of them is comparable with Shakespeare's really great successor, Ben Jonson. The stage so rapidly became immoral that only the vote of Parliament to close the theaters saved the drama from dissolution by corruption.

Royal Academy. The Royal Academy of Arts in London was founded in 1768 "for the purpose of cultivating and improving the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture." George III gave the Academy his support and nominated the thirty-six original members. For a number of years he paid the deficiof the Academy in the conduct of its exhibitions and schools. Sir Joshua Reynolds was the first president, and Benjamin West, an American, was the second — holding the office for twenty-eight years. Johnson was appointed Professor in Ancient Literature the year after the Academy was founded; the title carried with it no salary.

PARAGRAPH 38

Goldsmith. Oliver Goldsmith (1728–1774), "the representative of poetry and light literature" in The Club, was "the most versatile, the most charming, the most inconsistent, and the most lovable genius of all the literary men who made famous the age of Johnson." According to Johnson's Latin epitaph of him in Westminster Abbey, he touched nothing he did not adorn (Nihil quod tetigit non ornavit); according to Boswell, however, 'His mind resembled a fertile but thin soil. . . . The oak of the forest did not grow there: but the elegant shrubbery and the fragrant parterre appeared in gay succession." In poetry he wrote such charming descriptive poems as The Traveller and The Deserted Village; in drama he produced such immortal comedies as The Goodnatured Man and She Stoops to Conquer; in fiction he wrote the inimitable Vicar of Wakefield, the Dr. Primrose of which is supposed to have been modeled after his own father, a poor Irish curate of noble character. But the art of conversation Goldsmith did not adorn. Garrick described him as one

> ". . . for shortness called Noll,
> Who wrote like an angel and talked like poor Poll."

Johnson himself said, "No man was more foolish when he had not a pen in his hand, or more wise when he had."

Reynolds. Sir Joshua Reynolds (1723–1792), the most celebrated English portrait painter, was also a most urbane and polished gentleman. He it was who suggested the formation of The Club. Gibbon called Johnson "Reynolds' oracle." Reynolds painted Johnson's portrait many times, as well as the portraits of the other members of The Club. Boswell dedicated his Life of Johnson to Reynolds in most flattering terms: 'Your equal and placid temper, your variety of conversation, your true politeness, . . . and that enlarged hospitality which has long made your house a common center of union for the great, the accomplished, the learned, and the ingenious; all these qualities I can, in perfect confidence of not being accused of flattery, ascribe to you." Reynolds was the first president of the Royal Academy, and delivered his able critical addresses, Discourses on Painting, before it. He also wrote for Johnson three numbers of The Idler.

Burke. Edmund Burke (1729–1797), the most celebrated English orator (he was of Irish birth), was equally great as philosophical politician and writer of prose. Unlike many of his contemporaries he was incorruptible in politics and pure in private life. His best-known orations are Conciliation with America, American Taxation, and Impeachment of Warren Hastings; his best prose work is his Reflections on the French Revolution. As an orator his style was too refined, his speeches too carefully constructed and too full of details to be as effective as they deserved to be. As Goldsmith said, he was "... too deep for his hearers still went on refining, and thought of convincing while they thought of dining." Johnson always admired Burke and said of him, "You could not stand five minutes with that man beneath a shed while it rained, but you must be convinced that you had been standing with the greatest man you had ever yet seen." Burke, on the other hand, was a consistent admirer of Johnson and was well content in conversation "to have rung the bell to him."

Gibbon. Edward Gibbon (1737–1794), the first great English historian and one of the greatest England has produced, is notable chiefly for his great work, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, in six volumes. The work is marred for many by the author's skeptical attitude toward Christianity; yet he is "the one historian of the eighteenth century whom modern research has neither set aside nor threatened to set aside." His scholarship, his reading, his search for facts were fully as great as Macaulay's. His style, the very climax of classicism, is so majestic and sonorous, so elaborate and ornate, that it often obscures one's interest in the narrative. There is an oft-quoted comparison of Gibbon and Johnson by a contemporary, George Colman, "Johnson's style was grand, and Gibbon's elegant; the stateliness of the former was sometimes pedantic, and the polish of the latter was occasionally finical. Johnson marched to kettle-drums and trumpets; Gibbon moved to flutes and hautboys: Johnson hewed passages through the Alps, while Gibbon levelled walks through parks and gardens."

Jones. Sir William Jones (1746–1794), "the greatest linguist of the age," was a distinguished English Oriental scholar, the first to recognize the value of Sanskrit. He knew thirteen European and Oriental languages well, and had a moderate acquaintance with twenty-eight others. For a more profitable occupation financially, he turned to law and speedily distinguished himself. He became the leading authority on Hindu and Mohammedan law. Withal he was noted for his modesty: Mrs. Thrale says that Johnson "pronounced one day at my house a most lofty panegyric upon Jones, the Orientalist, who seemed little pleased with the praise."

Garrick. David Garrick (1716–1779), the foremost actor of his age, came to London a graceful, dapper, merry youth, with the avowed purpose of studying law. He inherited a small fortune and set up in business as a wine merchant, but speedily failed. He then turned to his true field, the theater. Of his success there little need be added to Macaulay's words in ¶ 22 of the Life of Johnson. Under his managership (1747–1776), the Drury Lane was for a generation the leading London theater. Perhaps note should be made of his services to the stage and of the source of success. His services to the stage were twofold: he considerably purified the stage of grossness; he revived interest in Shakespeare by a masterly production of his plays (even if often in much altered form — he himself played in not less than seventeen Shakespearean parts. The secret of his success seems to have been the naturalness of his acting: for stately and sonorous declamation he substituted "rapid changes of passion and humor in both voice and gesture, which held his audiences spellbound." Goldsmith's lines about him are famous:

> "Our Garrick's a salad; for in him we see > Oil, vinegar, sugar, and saltness agree!
> As an actor, confess'd without rival to shine;
> As a wit, if not first, in the very first line.
> On the stage he was natural, simple, affecting:
> 'Twas only when he was off, he was acting."

Sir Joshua Reynolds once remarked "That Dr. Johnson considered Garrick as his property, and would never suffer anyone to praise or abuse him but himself" — of both of which privileges he often made use. His allusion to Garrick's death in the Lives of the Poets (see the one on Edmund Smith) was later inscribed upon the Garrick memorial in Lichfield: "I am disappointed by that stroke of death which has eclipsed the gaiety of nations, and impoverished the public stock of harmless pleasure."

Bennet Langton (1737–1801). The representative in The Club of classical, especially Greek, literature, is now famous chiefly as a friend of Johnson's. Of him Johnson said, "The earth does not bear a worthier man. . . . I do not know who will go to Heaven if he does not." Yet, with all his virtue, his best friend was the irresponsible Beauclerk.

Topham Beauclerk (1737–1780). The representative in Th Club of gay society, owes, like Langton, his fame chiefly to hi friendship with Johnson. The better side of his character i evidenced by the warmth of feeling both Langton and Johnso had for him. Upon his death Johnson said of him most exactly "Poor dear Beauclerk . . . his wit and his folly, his acutenes and maliciousness, his merriment and reasoning, are now over."

PARAGRAPH 39

Wilkes : the Bill of Rights Society. John Wilkes (1727–1797 was a political agitator who, though utterly unprincipled an of loose morals generally, yet succeeded in so arousing the in dignation of the people that the government was forced to con cede the freedom of the press (including the publication of de bates in Parliament) and freedom of election. He established notorious Whig paper, the North Briton, which attacked Lor Bute most boldly and bitterly. He was expelled from the Hous of Commons for printing an obscene poem, and for the "false scandalous, and seditious libel" of the government in No. 45 o the North Briton. While under sentence he was elected to Par liament for Middlesex. He was promptly expelled by Common and as promptly re-elected. His election was declared voi Again he was elected and again he was rejected. When he wa elected a fourth time, his opponent, who had received only on fourth as many votes, was seated. Immediately a storm of pro test broke out with the battle cry "Wilkes and Liberty." Th government was defeated in several elections and Wilkes wa allowed to sit. A few years later he became Lord Mayor o London and even George III was compelled to admit that h had never met so well bred a lord mayor — though his conversa tion was frequently obscene and profane, he knew how to suit to his company. Staunch Tory and ardent moralist as Johnso was, he confessed that "Jack has great variety of talk, Jack is scholar, and Jack has the manners of a gentleman." The Bill Rights Society was doubtless one of the many political societies clubs agitating for Parliamentary reform.

Whitefield : Calvinistic Methodists. George Whitefield (1714 1770) was, like Wilkes, an agitator — he was to religion wha Wilkes was to politics. He and the two Wesleys were the leade of the little group of Oxford students called Methodists becau of their methodical regularity in attending the weekly sacramen Whitefield was the most effective preacher of the three. He wa theatrical and extravagant but intense and earnest. It was sai that when he preached to twenty thousand colliers, grimy fro he coalpits, one could see the tears " making white channels down heir blackened cheeks." The enthusiasm, the strong spiritual excitement he aroused among the lower classes was tremendous. Women fainted ; strong men burst into sobs. Whitefield broke vith Wesley over the doctrine of Calvinism. Wesley was opposed to the Calvinistic tenet of predestination or election — hat God selected those for salvation — and taught that each nan could be saved by victory over sin. The Calvinistic Methodists preached the depravity of human nature and salvation only by the election (selection) of the Almighty. Dr. Johnson, though Whitefield entered Pembroke only twelve months after Johnson eft it, had no very high opinion of him : " Whitefield . . . did not draw attention by doing better than others, but by doing what vas strange. Were Astley [a celebrated bareback-rider] to preach a sermon standing upon his head upon a horse's back, he would collect a multitude to hear him ; but no wise man would say he had made a better sermon for that."

PARAGRAPH 40

Southwark. A borough of London on the south side of the Thames largely occupied by commercial houses. After Mr. Thrale's death, Johnson sold the brewery for Mrs. Thrale for £135,000. This brewery is still the largest commercial establishment in Southwark.

Streatham. A suburb south of London in Johnson's time. It is now a large residential district within London. Thrale's house, Streatham Park, is no longer standing, but there is in the parish church of St. Leonard a memorial of him with an inscription by Johnson.

Buck and Maccaroni. John Wilson Croker, fearing that the words might become obsolete — and Macaulay states they have — kindly defines the words for us in his edition of Boswell : " It may be useful to future readers to know that the word macaroni . . . and the word buck . . . are nearly synonomous with the term dandy, employed now-a-days to express a young gentleman who in his dress and manners affects the extreme of fashion." Croker's fears were groundless ; Macaulay's statement is unfounded. " Any schoolboy knows " — in Macaulay's favorite phrase — what buck means, and macaroni is preserved for us in this meaning in Yankee Doodle. It is said " the popularity of the dish in Italy led a set of coxcombs who had travelled there to institute the Macaroni Club : and its members, with their ridiculous dress, soon spread the contagion."

Bath . . . Brighton. Both famous watering places. Bath has been noted since ancient times for its mineral springs. It west of London about one hundred miles. It was the most fas ionable resort of London in Johnson's time. Brighton is a se shore resort on the English Channel. It is only fifty-one mil from London; its ready accessibility accounts in part for i popularity.

Fleet Street. A street in the heart of London running paral to the Thames. It got its name from the Fleet River, whi was converted into a sewer in 1765. Johnson's garret is still most popular literary pilgrimage.

Mitre Tavern. In a court off Fleet Street. Johnson lov inns in general and the Mitre Tavern, which was not far fro his home, in particular: "There is nothing which has yet bee contrived by man, by which so much happiness is produced as b a good tavern or inn." Boswell's meetings with Johnson fr quently took place in the Mitre Tavern.

Paragraph 41

Hebrides. A large group of islands off the west coast of Sco land, also called the Western Isles. They are very barren ar little cultivated.

Lord Mansfield. William Murray (1705–1793), an emine English jurist and orator, Chief justice of the Court of the King Bench (the highest court of Common Law in England) from 17 to 1788. He was a Tory but a moderate one. Macaulay cal him "the father of modern Toryism." He had the almost uniqu experience of remaining in the British cabinet through variou changes in administration.

Macpherson, "Fingal." In 1761, a Scotch schoolmaster name James Macpherson published what he said was a translatio from Ossian, a Gaelic bard of the third century, under the tit of Fingal, an Ancient Epic Poem. The work aroused grea interest and was widely accepted as authentic. Johnson mad investigations for himself on his journey through the island upon which Macpherson contended the poems had been found and he reached the conclusion that Macpherson had found onl fragments, which he had woven into a romance of his own mak ing. Macpherson was challenged to produce the originals, an though he made constant promises, he never fulfilled them Strangely enough, Macpherson was buried in Westminster Abbe only a few feet from Johnson.

Paragraphs 42, 43

Maxime, etc. "I very much desire, if you are willing, to debat with you."

Apophthegm of Bentley. Richard Bentley (1662–1742), one of the greatest classical scholars England has produced, the forerunner of modern critical philology. According to Boswell, Johnson "thought very highly of Bentley; that no man now went so far in the kinds of learning that he cultivated; that the many attacks on him were owing to envy, and to a desire of being known, by being in competition with such a man. . . . And he was right not to answer; for in his hazardous method of writing, he could not but be often enough wrong." The hazardous method of writing has reference to his editions of Horace, Terence, and Milton, in which he made thousands of conjectural emendations. Bentley's many enemies were due in large part to his strenuous efforts to reform Trinity College, the "most splendid foundation in the university of Cambridge." The college had fallen from its high estate because of the indolence and luxurious habits of its fellows. Bentley diverted the income of the fellows to the uses of the college. The fellows for forty years strove mightily to oust him and several times barely fell short of succeeding. Bentley remained undisturbed through these attacks, though his scholarship seems to have lost much of its originality after his appointment to the mastership. It is apparent enough why he should say from the bottom of his heart, "Depend upon it, no man was ever written down but by himself."

Paragraph 44

Almon and Stockdale. Well-known booksellers of Johnson's time. Stockdale was for a long time Almon's porter; when Almon retired, Stockdale set up a bookshop in opposition to his successor.

Taxation no Tyranny. One of the few productions of Johnson that Boswell could not admire — though Boswell always differed, deferentially indeed, with his idol over two topics, the Scotch and America. Boswell said of this pamphlet: "I could not perceive in it that ability of argument or that felicity of expression, for which he was, upon other occasions, so eminent. Positive assertion, sarcastical severity, and extravagant ridicule, which he himself reprobated as a test of truth, were united in this rhapsody."

Paragraph 45

Sheridan. Richard Brinsley Sheridan (1751–1816), most gifted as a writer of comedies and scarcely less brilliant as Parliamentary orator. He was proposed for membership in The Club by Johnson himself — probably in 1777, when Sheridan was only twenty-six — with the recommendation that "He who has written the two best comedies of the age is surely a considerable man." Sheridan's comedies, The Rivals and The School for Scandal, vie with Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer for recognition as the best acting comedy in English. His greatest orations were those in the impeachment of Warren Hastings.

Wilson. Richard Wilson (1714–1782), great English landscape painter. It is interesting to note that the converse of Macaulay's propositions does not hold: Sheridan could and did deliver orations as great as Burke's; Wilson was a portrait painter of no mean ability, and though he could not have equaled Reynolds's his early portraits were most creditable productions. He painted full-length portraits of the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York.

PARAGRAPH 46

Cowley. Abraham Cowley (1618–1667), the most popular poet of his age, the age of Milton. While he was alive, his fame was much greater than that of Milton; soon, however, posterity reversed this judgment. Cowley's precocity was as great as that of Johnson and Macaulay. He wrote his first long poem when he was ten, and was famous before his sixteenth birthday.

Gilbert Walmesley. See ¶ 6 and note.

Wits of Button. The coffee-house was in the generation preceding Johnson the favorite meeting place of "all the world." The number of coffee-houses in London about the time of Johnson's birth has been estimated at three thousand! Each house had its own habitues, who were usually men of similar tastes and interests. From the word pictures of Addison and Steele in The Tatler and The Spectator, one can understand how the whole life of London centered in these delightful resorts. Button, an old servant of Addison's, kept (near Covent Garden) a house that was the favorite meeting place of Addison, Steele, Swift, and Pope. "Here it was," Johnson wrote, "that the wits of that time used to assemble."

Cibber. Colley Cibber (1671–1757), an excellent comic actor, an indifferent dramatist, and a mediocre poet, unjustly made by Pope the central figure of the Dunciad [Epic of Dunces]. Cibber acted for years in the Drury Lane Theater, and became manager of it. He produced many of his own plays and adapted Shakespeare to what he thought were the exigencies of the stage. Cibber was poet laureate from 1730 to 1757. Johnson, like Pope — and Fielding, too — had little use for Cibber, of whom he said, "I wondered that he had so little to say in conversation, for he had kept the best company and learnt all that can be got

y the ear. He abused Pindar to me, and then showed me an de of his own, with an absurd couplet, making a linnet soar on an agle's wing."

Orrery. John Boyle, Earl of Cook and Orrery (1707-1762), uthor of Remarks on the Life and Writings of Jonathan Swift. oswell says that Johnson "told us he was well acquainted with wift's Lord Orrery. He said he was a feeble-minded man." ut Johnson went on to explain the nature of this feeble-mindness -Orrery was afraid to read certain criticisms of one of his books.

Swift. Jonathan Swift (1667-1745), the leading English prose atirist. His best-known work, Gulliver's Travels, was a bitter atire upon human society. The first of Gulliver's four voyages to Lilliput, where the inhabitants are about as tall as a man's umb, and act and have motives on the same dwarfish scale. he parties, the Littlendians and the Bigendians, are divided pon the question of whether an egg should be broken upon its ig or its little end—a satire, of course, upon the politics of ngland at the time. Johnson got the names he used in the arliamentary Debates from this masterpiece of Swift's. He also cluded Swift's life among the Lives of the Poets, though his oetry is not great either in quality or quantity. Yet he was rongly prejudiced against Swift and constantly belittled his enius. "Swift has a higher reputation than he deserves," he ace said. Again, "If Swift was really the author of the Tale of Tub, as the best of his other performances were a very inferior erit, he should have hanged himself after he had written it."

Savage . . . services . . . to Pope. Johnson accuses Savage of supplying Pope with private intelligence and secret incidents, that the ignominy of an informer was added to the terror of a atirist." Pope doubtless used these details in the Dunciad.

Paragraph 49

Cowley. See notes on ¶ 46.

Dryden. John Dryden (1631-1700), greatest English poet between Milton and Pope. His life was marred by the readiness ith which he shifted his allegiance, political and religious: he as by birth a Puritan and wrote an excellent poem in praise of romwell; with the Restoration he placed himself on the winning de, writing several poems in honor of Charles II; when James I, with Catholic predilections, came to the throne, Dryden turned atholic. His literary productions, like Pope's and Johnson's, ere most varied. He wrote bitter political satires in verse like bsalom and Achitophel, innumerable hack-work comedies in med couplets, various critical essays in prose, translations of Virgil and Juvenal, and a large number of odes and miscellaneous poems like Alexander's Feast. Like Ben Jonson before him and Pope and Dr. Johnson after him, Dryden was the literary dictator of his age. He held court in Wills's coffee-house. He spent his evenings here in a chair by the fire in winter, by the window in summer. He was a subject for sympathetic treatment by Johnson because he was the forerunner of the classical age. He established heroic verse as the standard for satiric, didactic, and descriptive poetry. Johnson declared that Dryden "found English poetry brick and he left it marble."

Pope. See notes on ¶ 14 and ¶ 15.

Gray. Thomas Gray (1716–1771), a forerunner with Burns of the revolt against classicism and of the romantic revival of the early nineteenth century. He was the author of "the best-known poem in the English language," the Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard. It is hardly probable, therefore, that Johnson, the staunch defender of classicism, could write sympathetically or justly of this revolutionary. Boswell makes Johnson say of Gray, "Sir, he was dull in company, dull in his closet, dull everywhere. He was dull in a new way and that made people think him great. He was a mechanical poet." Boswell showed more perspicuity in saying, "I understand he was reserved, and might appear dull in company; but surely he was not dull in poetry."

Paragraph 50

Malone. Edmond Malone (1741–1812), a famous Irish critic and Shakespearean scholar. Johnson had a great regard for Malone as critic, and Malone, who succeeded him in editing Shakespeare, did honor to Johnson's memory in a preface.

Robertson. William Robertson (1721–1793), an eminent Scotch historian who closely imitated Johnson's style. As Johnson said, "Sir, if Robertson's style be faulty, he owes it to me; that is, having too many words, and those too big ones." Concerning Robertson, Johnson repeated the famous advice to young writers that so impressed Macaulay: "I would say to Robertson what an old tutor of a college said to one of his pupils: 'Read over you compositions, and wherever you meet with a passage which you think is particularly fine, strike it out.'"

Paragraph 51

Music-master from Brescia. Gabriel Piozzi, a talented Italian musician. Macaulay, influenced no doubt by sympathy for Johnson, by Boswell's jealousy of Mrs. Thrale, and most of all by the Victorian prejudice against "mixed marriages," is grossly unfair both to Mrs. Thrale and to Piozzi. Hester Lynch's marriage to Henry Thrale was only one of convenience: he was considerably older, and their tastes were quite different. Her affection for Piozzi was warm and permanent, but was no more a "degrading passion" than any other love match. She lived happily with him until his death in 1809.

Solemn and tender prayer. Both Macaulay and Boswell misrepresent the circumstances under which this prayer was delivered. He was leaving "that beloved home" because Mrs. Thrale was giving up the house. Six months later Johnson is found by Boswell at Mrs. Thrale's new residence in Argylle Street, London.

Ephesian matron. An allusion to a story in Petronius and summarized by Jeremy Taylor in Holy Dying, Ch. V. A widow of Ephesus, an ancient city in Asia Minor, was so overcome by grief that she followed the body of her husband to the grave "resolved to weep to death." But she found stationed nearby a soldier who offered her wine and sympathy. She was so solaced by his comfortings that she fell in love with him and married him the same day. A similar anecdote is told by Mr. A. E. Newton concerning an ancestor of Mrs. Thrale's.[1]

Two pictures in Hamlet. Act III, Sc. 4, lines 53 ff.

> HAMLET. Look here, upon this picture, and on this,
> The counterfeit presentment of two brothers.
> See, what a grace was seated on this brow;
> Hyperion's curls; the front of Jove himself,
> An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;
> A station like the herald Mercury
> New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill;
> A combination and a form indeed,
> Where every god did seem to set his seal,
> To give the world assurance of a man.
> This was your husband. Look you now what follows:
> Here is your husband; like a mildew'd ear,
> Blasting his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?
> Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed,
> And batten on this moor? Ha! have you eyes?

Windham. William Windham (1750–1810), a distinguished Whig politician and orator, a close friend of both Burke and Johnson. In August, 1784 (he died the following December), Johnson wrote a touching letter to Windham beginning "The tenderness with which you have been pleased to treat me through my long illness, neither health nor sickness can, I hope, make me forget."

[1] Amenities of Book Collecting, page 188 f.

Frances Burney. Fanny Burney (1752–1840), afterwards Madame D'Arblay. Her first — and best — novel was Evelina, which Dr. Johnson thought worthy of Richardson. Sir Joshua Reynolds and Burke both professed to have sat up all night reading it. Miss Burney was much cultivated by Mrs. Thrale as was Johnson. It was at the Thrales' that Johnson grew to know her so well and to become so fond of her — his "little Burney," as he called her. Her later novels, except possibly Cecilia, are not comparable with her first. In 1793 she married General Alexandre D'Arblay, an exiled French artillery officer. Her Diary and Letters, to which she owes her continued fame, was bitterly attacked by Croker and as eloquently defended by Macaulay in The Edinburgh Review.

Westminster Abbey. The Abbey of St. Peter, the most widely celebrated church in the British empire. It is said to have been begun by Edward the Confessor in 1050. Its peculiar fame lies not so much in its age or the beauty of its architecture, but in the fact that it has long been the place of coronation of the English sovereigns and the burial place of most of them and of many of their greatest subjects. A part of the south transept (cross passage) is famous under the name of "Poets' Corner": in it are buried most of England's great writers.

Cowley and Denham, Dryden and Congreve, Gay, Prior, and Addison. British authors, all to a certain extent poets, whom Johnson wrote of in the Lives of the Poets. For Cowley, see note on ¶ 46; Dryden, ¶ 49; Addison, ¶ 23. Sir John Denham (1615–1668) was a minor Cavalier poet. William Congreve (1670–1729) produced between 1690 and 1700 a number of excellent comedies only slightly tainted by the immorality of the stage in his day. John Gay (1685-1732) is famous chiefly for his Beggars' Opera, a burlesque which made "Rich gay and Gay rich," Rich being the name of the producer. Matthew Prior (1664–1721) was a minor poet and diplomatist during the time of William and Mary, and Queen Anne. Johnson thought him wanting "not wisdom as a statesman or elegance as a poet."

PARAGRAPH 53

Anfractuosities. Defined by Johnson as "fulness of windings and turnings." Boswell reports Johnson as having used the word in reference to Mr. Langton's mother and father, who had refused to sit for their pictures: "Sir, among the anfractuosities of the human mind, I know not if it may not be one, that there is a superstitious reluctance to sit for a picture."

APPENDIX A

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF JOHNSON'S CHIEF WORKS

(See Boswell's Life for a complete Chronological Catalogue of the Prose Works.)

1. Translation of Pope's MESSIAH into Latin Verse (1728). This was the first of Johnson's works to be printed. It was written as a Christmas exercise less than two months after he entered college. Pope said that the translator left it "a question for posterity, whether his or mine be the original."

2. Translation of Lobo's VOYAGE TO ABYSSINIA (1733). Printed in Birmingham and published in London, anonymously. It was a translation from the French of a Monsieur Le Grand, and not from Latin, as Macaulay says. The book is of interest first, because it doubtless suggested to Johnson the scene of Rasselas; secondly, because the preface shows Johnson's style: "The Reader will here find no Regions cursed with irremediable Barrenness, or blest'd with Spontaneous Fecundity."

3. London (1738). A short poem (236 ll.) in heroic verse. It is an imitation of Juvenal's Third Satire. Though it was published anonymously, Pope rightly declared that its author would not long be concealed. The story of the poem is as follows: the poet's imaginary friend, one Thales, disgusted with London life, departs for Wales. Upon leaving, he contrasts the pleasures of country life with the discomfort and corruption of city life. His political views are expressed by his blaming the Whigs for nearly all the dangers of city life. One line, capitalized by the author, is particulaly famous: "Slow rises worth, by poverty depress'd."

4. Parliamentary Debates (c. 1740-43). In Cave's Gentleman's Magazine. Johnson did not expect that the reports could be accepted as giving the words of the speakers. When he found that such was the case, he refused any longer to be "accessory to the propagation of falsehood." The supposed authors, however, did not object. Two speeches written entirely by Johnson appeared in Chesterfield's collected works. A famous speech of Pitt's, in which he spoke of "the atrocious crime of being a young man," was declared unequalled in Demosthenes. Johnson coolly remarked, "That speech I wrote in a garret in Exeter Street."

5. The Life of Savage (1744). Published anonymously ; later included with only slight alterations in The Lives of the Poets. It is the study of a personality rather than of a poet, and to that fact it owes its extraordinary interest. It is also of special interest from the light it throws upon Johnson's own life in London at the time.

6. The Plan for a Dictionary of the English Language (1747). Addressed to Lord Chesterfield. The Plan states the objects of the Dictionary : "a dictionary by which the pronunciation of our language may be fixed, and its attainment facilitated ; by which its purity may be preserved, its use ascertained, and its duration lengthened." It was to be a dictionary, in short, not so much to give the derivation and meaning of the words as to set a standard of good usage.

7. The Vanity of Human Wishes (1749). A poem in heroic verse, 105 lines longer than London. It was written in imitation of Juvenal's Tenth Satire. Unlike London, it was published in Johnson's own name. The inevitable disappointment of human ambition is seen by the modern instances and by a heartfelt description of the life of a scholar. It is universally regarded as superior to London, being "in a graver and higher tone." The poem closes "with the assurance that happiness may be attained, if we 'apply our hearts' to piety."

8. Irene (1737, 1749). A five-act tragedy in blank verse upon the Greek model. Johnson carried three acts with him when he went to London. He worked upon it during his first months in London and finished it on his visit to Lichfield in the summer of 1737. Garrick was indebted to Johnson for the prologue written in 1747 for the Drury Lane opening. He repaid this debt by putting on Johnson's Irene in 1749. It is really not a drama but a series of dialogues forming a moral poem. The story was not a new one. The first Sultan of the Turks, Mahomet the Great, is passionately in love with a Greek captive, Irene. Just as she "has blessed him with compliance," a conspiracy against Mahomet is detected. Its ringleader accuses Irene of complicity. At Mahomet's command, she is led away to be strangled. A few minutes too late her innocence is disclosed.

9. The Rambler (1750-52). A periodical essay of The Spectator type. One note may be added to the excellent criticism of Macaulay in ¶ 23, 24 : Johnson's didactic purpose was too obvious. Unlike Addison he did not offer his instruction in a way to attract unwilling attention ; he disdained to sugar coat his pills.

10. Dictionary of the English Language (1747, 1755). In two folio volumes, with Preface, History of the English Language, and Grammar of the English Tongue. It was by no means the first English dictionary, though it was the first with the avowed purpose of standardizing the language rather than of merely recording its use. Macaulay states fairly enough the merits and defects of the work.

11. The Idler (1758–1760). A periodical essay similar to The Rambler. Unlike The Rambler, however, it appeared only once a week, was not an independent publication but a part of a journal, and was very much lighter in touch.

12. Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia (1759). A short solemn novel upon the theme of The Vanity of Human Wishes. There is little or no story, no climax, no conclusion. It is really not a novel but a series of discussions and disquisitions upon the limitations of life — a prose Vanity of Human Wishes. The story is very simple. Rasselas and his sister Nekayah are confined in the "Happy Valley," where their every conceivable wish is gratified. They are not happy, however, and desire to see the outside world. Finally the prince and princess escape, attended only by her companion, Pekuah, and their teacher, an old sage, Imlac. Wandering over the land, they are forced to the conclusion that human existence in general is miserable and fruitless, and they ultimately return to the "Happy Valley" — resigned to the futility of searching for happiness and resolved to take life as they may find it. Macaulay's criticism of the novel is not altogether just. As to style, he is right: the book is to be censured for its Latinistic diction, and its involved and balanced sentence structure; it is to be praised for its grandeur and precision of language. But as to subject matter, Macaulay is not quite fair. Johnson would himself have been the first to admit the inconsistencies of time and place, but he thought objections to them "the petty cavils of petty minds." He did not object to them in Shakespeare but merely called attention to them.

13. The Plays of William Shakespeare (1765). Eight volumes, with a preface, notes, and an account of each play. Macaulay's criticism of this work is very poor. In the first place, the preface, according to a fairer critic than Macaulay, has "a place by itself among critical pronouncements on Shakespeare." It is famous both for its robustly honest statement of Shakespeare's faults and for its resolute ranking of Shakespeare with Homer. It is equally famous for its refutation of the dramatic unities — the classic rule that the action of a play should happen in one place, in one day, in one plot, a rule which Johnson himself followed in Irene but later came to recognize as fallacious. Secondly, the notes are far better than Macaulay would have us believe. He admits the excellence of those in which Johnson "had an opportunity of showing how attentively he had during many years observed human life and human nature," but he objects that Johnson made not "one happy conjectural emendation or one ingenious and satisfactory explanation of a passage which had baffled preceding commentators." The simple difficulty with these two objections is that they are quite untrue. As to the emendations, Johnson attempted, as he proudly boasted, to restore every passage which appeared to him corrupt. He worked on a very sound principle that the "reading of the ancient books is probably true," and his text was much nearer the originals than any that had appeared. But he used his sound common sense in all emendations, some of which, according to a modern authority, "find an unsuspected place in modern editions." The notes, too, are still a "firm land of common sense in a sea of ingenious fancies. . . . No edition, within its limits, is a safer guide to Shakespeare's meaning." As further proof of the utter falsity of Macaulay's criticism, one need but go to the Variorum Edition containing all the intelligent comments of all commentators upon the text of the plays. There one will find Johnson quoted with amazing frequency. Thirdly, Macaulay lied, as Johnson bluntly would have said, when he accused Johnson of ignorance of the other Elizabethan dramatists. The evidence Macaulay adduces to prove his assertion is purely negative — that Johnson quoted only Shakespeare and Ben Jonson in the Dictionary. It does not follow that Johnson knew only Shakespeare and Ben. Moreover, in the Prospectus of the edition, Johnson expressed the hope "that by comparing the works of Shakespeare with those of writers who lived at the same time, immediately preceded, or immediately followed him, he shall be able to ascertain his ambiguities." And the scrupulousness of Johnson's honor is too unquestioned to allow any doubt that he would misinform or mislead. Modern research has established the fact beyond question that Johnson had "a good knowledge of Elizabethan English."

14. Taxation no Tyranny (1775), and other political tracts. The other three were The False Alarm (1770), Falkland Islands (1771), and The Patriot (1774). None of these would be known to-day if Johnson had not been the author. Though Johnson was not great as a pamphleteer, he was not inferior to the other political writers. The fault lay in the type of composition as much as in the author. The greatest defect was his prejudice — another common failing of pamphleteers.

15. A Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland (1775). The book is less interesting than Boswell's Tour to the Hebrides because it is not so much a record of the actual adventures of the inety-four days of " vigorous exertion " as a series of thoughts nd reflections upon a different civilization. His prejudice did ot disturb judicious Scotchmen, as they recognized in it only ne " natural prejudice of John Bull as a tourist."

16. The Lives of the English Poets (1779, 1781). Macaulay is rgely right in his criticism of this work : it is generally admitted o be " the best of Johnson's works " ; its merits are the enter- aining narratives, the shrewd and profound remarks on life and uman nature, the vigorous and acute criticism, the greatly im- roved style. The defects arise from the author's prejudices nd his deficiency in sensibility. Macaulay does not explain, owever, the nature of these defects. Johnson's prejudice is in his case that in favor of the classical school, especially the heroic ouplet. His deficiency in sensibility was his lack of appreciation for the love of nature and for the spontaneity of the new Romantic School. Both these defects go to make the life of Gray the worst. There are in all fifty-two lives, beginning with Cowley, extending to Gray, and including Milton, Dryden, Swift, Addison, and Pope.

CHRONOLOGICA

JOHNSON'S LIFE	JOHNSON'S WORKS
Early Life (1709–1737)
1709. Birth, September 18
1712. Touched by Queen Anne
1728. Entered Pembroke College, Oxford	1728. Translation of Pope Messiah
1731. Death of his father
1735. Marriage; academy at Edial	1735. Translation of Lobo Voyage to Abyssinia
1737. Migration to London
Struggle for Recognition (1737–1747)
	1738. London, the poem
	1740–1743. Parliamentary D bates
	1744. Life of Savage
Recognition and Literary Activity (1747–1762)
	1747. Plan for a Dictionary
	1749. Vanity of Hum Wishes
	Production of Irene
1752. Death of his wife	1750–1752. The Rambler
1755. Letter to Chesterfield	1755. The Dictionary
	1758–1760. The Idler
1759. Death of his mother	1759. Rasselas
Affluence and Literary Inactivity (1762–1773)
1762. Pensioned
1763. Introduction to Boswell
1764. Founding of The Club
1765. L.L. D. from Dublin Introduction to Thrales	1765. Edition of Shakespear
Resumption of Literary Activity (1773–1781)
1773. Tour of Scotland	1775. Journey to the Weste Islands
1775. D.C. L., Oxford	Taxation no Tyranny
	1779. Lives of the Poets in pr
	1781. Lives of the Poets co pleted
Last Days and Succeeding Years (1781–1791)
1784. Mrs. Thrale's second marriage
1784. Death, December 13

ABLE

CONTEMPORARY HISTORY	CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE
Early Life (1709–1737)
710. Trial of Sacheverell
714. Death of Queen Anne and accession of George I	1711–1713. The Spectator 1726. Swift's Gulliver's Travels
721–1742. Domination of Walpole	1728. Pope's Dunciad
727. Accession of George II	1731. Gentleman's Magazine founded
Struggle for Recognition (1737–1747)
746. Chesterfield, Secretary of State	1740. Richardson's Pamela
Recognition and Literary Activity (1747–1762)
	1749. Fielding's Tom Jones
	1751. Gray's Elegy
760. Accession of George III
762. Ministry of Bute	1762. Churchill's The Ghost
Affluence and Literary Inactivity (1762–1773)
	1764. Goldsmith's Traveller
	1766. Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield
Resumption of Literary Activity (1773–1781)
	1773. Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer
775. Battle of Lexington	1775. Burke's Speech on Conciliation
776. Declaration of Independence	1776–1788. Gibbon's Decline and Fall of Roman Empire
Last Days and Succeeding Years (1781–1791)
783. Peace with America	1785. Boswell's Tour to the Hebrides
	1786. Mrs. Piozzi's Anecdotes of Johnson
	1791. Boswell's Life of Johnson

APPENDIX C

THE MEETING OF DR. JOHNSON AND WILKES

from Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson

I am now to record a very curious incident in Dr. Johnso life, which fell under my own observation ; of which pars ma fui, and which I am persuaded will, with the liberal-minded, much to his credit.

My desire of being acquainted with celebrated men of ev description, had made me, much about the same time, obt an introduction to Dr. Samuel Johnson and to John Wilk Esq. Two men more different could perhaps not be selected of all mankind. They had even attacked one another with so asperity in their writings ; yet I lived in habits of friends with both. I could fully relish the excellence of each ; fo have ever delighted in that intellectual chymistry which separate good qualities from evil in the same person.

Sir John Pringle, " mine own friend and my Father's frien between whom and Dr. Johnson I in vain wished to establish acquaintance, as I respected and lived in intimacy with b of them, observed to me once, very ingeniously, " It is not friendship as in mathematicks, where two things, each equal a third, are equal between themselves. You agree with John as a middle quality, and you agree with me as a middle qualit but Johnson and I should not agree." Sir John was not su ciently flexible ; so I desisted ; knowing, indeed, that the pulsion was equally strong on the part of Johnson ; who, I kn not from what cause, unless his being a Scotchman, had form a very erroneous opinion of Sir John. But I conceived an i sistible wish, if possible, to bring Dr. Johnson and Mr. Wil together. How to manage it, was a nice and difficult matter.

My worthy booksellers and friends, Messieurs Dilly in Poultry, at whose hospitable and well-covered table I have s a greater number of literary men, than at any other, except t of Sir Joshua Reynolds, had invited me to meet Mr. Wilkes some more gentlemen, on Wednesday, May 15. " Pray (s I,) let us have Dr. Johnson." — " What with Mr. Wilkes ? for the world, (said Mr. Edward Dilly ;) Dr. Johnson would ne forgive me." — " Come, (said I,) if you'll let me negociate for y I will be answerable that all shall go well." DILLY. " Nay you will take it upon you, I am sure I shall be very happy to them both here."

Notwithstanding the high veneration which I entertained for r. Johnson, I was sensible that he was sometimes a little actu-ed by the spirit of contradiction, and by means of that I hoped should gain my point. I was persuaded that if I had come on him with a direct proposal, "Sir, will you dine in company th Jack Wilkes?" he would have flown into a passion, and uld probably have answered, "Dine with Jack Wilkes, Sir! d as soon dine with Jack Ketch."[1] I therefore, while we ere sitting quietly by ourselves at his house in an evening took casion to open my plan thus: — "Mr. Dilly, Sir, sends his spectful compliments to you, and would be happy if you would him the honour to dine with him on Wednesday next along th me, as I must soon go to Scotland." JOHNSON. "Sir, am obliged to Mr. Dilly. I will wait upon him — " BOSWELL. Provided, Sir, I suppose, that the company which he is to ve, is agreeable to you." JOHNSON. "What do you mean, r? What do you take me for? Do you think I am so ignorant the world, as to imagine that I am to prescribe to a gentleman hat company he is to have at his table?" BOSWELL. "I g your pardon, Sir, for wishing to prevent you from meeting ople whom you might not like. Perhaps he may have some of hat he calls his patriotick friends with him." JOHNSON. "Well, r, and what then? What care I for his patriotick friends? oh!" BOSWELL. "I should not be surprized to find Jack ilkes there." JOHNSON. "And if Jack Wilkes should be there, hat is that to me, Sir? My dear friend, let us have no more of is. I am sorry to be angry with you; but really it is treating e strangely to talk to me as if I could not meet any company hatever, occasionally." BOSWELL. "Pray, forgive me, Sir: meant well. But you shall meet whoever comes, for me." hus I secured him, and told Dilly that he would find him very ell pleased to be one of his guests on the day appointed.

Upon the much-expected Wednesday, I called on him about lf an hour before dinner, as I often did when we were to dine t together, to see that he was ready in time, and to accompany m. I found him buffeting his books, as upon a former occasion, vered with dust, and making no preparation for going abroad. How is this, Sir? (said I). Don't you recollect that you are to ne at Mr. Dilly's?" JOHNSON. "Sir, I did not think of going Dilly's: it went out of my head. I have ordered dinner at me with Mrs. Williams." BOSWELL. "But, my dear Sir, you ow you were engaged to Mr. Dilly, and I told him so. He will expect you, and will be much disappointed if you don't com JOHNSON. "You must talk to Mrs. Williams about this."

[1] This has been circulated as if actually said by Johnson; when e truth is, it was only supposed by me. — B.

Here was a sad dilemma. I feared that what I was so confid
I had secured, would yet be frustrated. He had accustom himself to shew Mrs. Williams such a degree of humane attenti as frequently imposed some restraint upon him; and I knew t if she should be obstinate, he would not stir. I hastened do stairs to the blind lady's room, and told her I was in great easiness, for Dr. Johnson had engaged to me to dine this day Mr. Dilly's, but that he had told me he had forgotten his gagement, and had ordered dinner at home. "Yes, Sir, (said s pretty peevishly,) Dr. Johnson is to dine at home." — "Mads (said I,) his respect for you is such, that I know he will not le you, unless you absolutely desire it. But as you have so much his company. I hope you will be good enough to forego it fo day: as Mr. Dilly is a very worthy man, has frequently h agreeable parties at his house for Dr. Johnson, and will be ver if the Doctor neglects him to-day. And then, Madam, be plea to consider my situation; I carried the message, and I assu Mr. Dilly that Dr. Johnson was to come, and no doubt he h made a dinner, and invited a company, and boasted of the hon he expected to have. I shall be quite disgraced if the Docto not there." She gradually softened to my solicitations, wh were certainly as earnest as most entreaties to ladies upon a occasion, and was graciously pleased to empower me to tell Johnson, "That all things considered, she thought he sho certainly go." I flew back to him, still in dust, and careless what should be the event, "indifferent in his choice to go or stay but as soon as I had announced to him Mrs. Williams's conse
he roared, "Frank, a clean shirt," and was very soon dr
When I had him fairly seated in a hackney-coach with mo exulted as much as a fortune-hunter who has got an heiress int post-chaise with him to set out for Gretna-Green.

When we entered Mr. Dilly's drawing-room, he found hims in the midst of a company he did not know. I kept myself sm and silent, watching how he would conduct himself. I observ him whispering to Mr. Dilly, "Who is that gentleman, sir?"
"Mr. Arthur Lee." — JOHNSON. "Too, too, too," (under breath,) which was one of his habitual mutterings. Mr. Art Lee could not but be very obnoxious to Johnson, for he was only a patriot, but an American. He was afterwards minis from the United States at the court of Madrid. "And who the gentleman in lace?" — "Mr. Wilkes, Sir." This infor tion confounded him still more; he had some difficulty to restr himself, and taking up a book, sat down upon a window-seat

ad, or at least kept his eye upon it intently for some time, till e composed himself. His feelings, I dare say, were aukward ough. But he no doubt recollected his having rated me for pposing that he could be at all disconcerted by any company, id he, therefore, resolutely set himself to behave quite as an sy man of the world, who could adapt himself at once to the sposition and manners of those whom he might chance to meet.
The cheering sound of "Dinner is upon the table," dissolved
s reverie, and we all sat down without any sympton of ill mour. There were present, beside Mr. Wilkes, and Mr. Arthur ee, who was an old companion of mine when he studied physick Edinburgh, Mr. (now Sir John) Miller, Dr. Lettsom, and Mr. ater, the druggist. Mr. Wilkes placed himself next to Dr.
hnson, and behaved to him with so much attention and poeness, that he gained upon him insensibly. No man eat more eartily than Johnson, or loved better what was nice and delicate.
r. Wilkes was very assiduous in helping him to some fine veal.
Pray give me leave, Sir ; — It is better here — A little of the own — Some fat, Sir — A little of the stuffing — Some gravy
- Let me have the pleasure of giving you some butter — Allow
e to recommend a squeeze of this orange ; — or the lemon, erhaps, may have more zest." — "Sir, Sir, I am obliged to you, r," cried Johnson, bowing, and turning his head to him with a ok for some time of "surly virtue,"[1] but, in a short while, of mplacency.

APPENDIX D

ASSIGNMENTS FOR STUDYING THE ESSAY

Lesson 1

a. Read §§ 1–5 of the Introduction.

b. Summarize each paragraph in a single complete sentence. rrange these topics as a sentence outline under the general head- g, The Essay as a Form of Literature.

c. Be prepared to answer the following questions : (1) What ere the circumstances of the origin of the modern essay ?) How did Bacon's essays differ from Montaigne's ? (3) What as the character of the English essay in the seventeenth cen- ry ? (4) What change took place in the nature of the English say in the eighteenth century ? (5) How did the English essay develop in the nineteenth century ? (6) How are essays classifi according to form ? (7) How are Macaulay's essays on Johns to be classified according to form ? (8) How are essays classifi according to subject matter and how would you so classi Macaulay's essays on Johnson ? (9) What is it necessary know to understand and to appreciate fully an essay ? Why ?

[1] Johnson's "London, a Poem," v. 145.

Lesson 2

a. Read §§ 6–18 of the Introduction.

b. Summarize as in Lesson 1 and arrange the topics as a se tence outline under the heading The Life of Macaulay.

c. Questions : (1) In what ways was Macaulay a typical V torian ? (2) What is meant by precocity ? Illustrate by e amples from Macaulay's life. (3) What university did Macaul attend and what marked successes and failure did he have (4) What two striking mental traits made possible the accumu tion of facts he was famous for ? (5) What was Macaulay first essay and what was its reception ? (6) How did he g drawn into politics ? (7) What led to his India appointment a why did he feel constrained to accept it ? (8) What was h greatest work in India ? (9) Upon his return how did he spe the following years ? (10) What was his method of compositi in writing the history ?

Lesson 3

a. Read §§ 19–29 of the Introduction.

b. Summarize and outline the heading Macaulay the Man.

c. Questions : (1) What picture have you in your mind Macaulay's appearance ? (2) What were his physical charact istics ? (3) How did he indulge his love of society ? (4) Wh were his feelings toward his sisters ? (5) What were his two ou standing virtues ? Give an example of each. (6) What famo remark was made concerning Macaulay's self-confidenc (7) What was Macaulay's attitude toward women and what your guess as to its cause ? (8) What was his attitude towa democracy and how do you explain that attitude ? (9) Wh were the differences between the Whigs and the Tories ? (1 What was the nature of Macaulay's Whiggism and how did affect his judgment ?

Lesson 4

a. Read §§ 30–41 of the Introduction.

b. Summarize and outline under the headings Macaula Position in Literature and Macaulay's Style.

c. Questions: (1) What is the title of Macaulay's volume of oems and what is the best-known poem in it? (2) What was Macaulay's method of preparing a speech? (3) What is the hief merit of Macaulay's History? (4) What is its chief weakess? (5) For what periodical did Macaulay write most of his ssays and how were they received by the public? (6) What as Macaulay's own attitude toward his essays? (7) How did Macaulay get clearness in his sentences? (8) In his paragraphs? 9) What is meant by concreteness and how did Macaulay attain ? (10) By what rhetorical device in particular did Macaulay ain force?

LESSON 5

a. Read §§ 42–51 of the Introduction.

b. Summarize and outline under the heading Background of Macaulay's Life of Johnson.

c. Questions: (1) What is the outstanding characteristic of Macaulay's first essay on Johnson? (2) How does the essay ublished in this volume compare with the early essay? (3) What s the theme, the underlying purpose or motive, of the Life of ohnson? (4) What difference and what striking point of simiarity existed between the London of Johnson's time and that of Addison's? (5) What effect had the political conditions of ohnson's time upon the fortunes of men of letters? (6) What s meant by romantic and classic in literature? (7) What was ohnson's chief defect as critic, and what was the source of it? 8) Upon what does Johnson's fame to-day rest? (9) Do you hink Boswell was a great biographer because of or in spite of his eaknesses? (10) What was Boswell's outstanding trait of haracter?

The Content of the Essay

LESSON 6

a. Read ¶¶ 1–9 of the essay.

b. Summarize each paragraph into a single complete sentence. Three sentences may be used for the first paragraph.) Arrange hese sentences in an outline under the heading, Introduction — ohnson's Early Life.

LESSON 7

a. Read ¶¶ 10–17.

b. Summarize as in Lesson 6 and arrange the sentences in outne form under the heading, Johnson's Struggles in London to ain Recognition.

LESSON 8

a. Read ¶¶ 18–33.

b. Summarize and outline under the heading, Johnson's Recognition and Early Literary Career in London.

LESSON 9

a. Read ¶¶ 34–40.

b. Summarize and outline under the heading, Johnson's Affluence and Period of Little Literary Activity.

LESSON 10

a. Read ¶¶ 41–52.

b. Summarize and outline under the headings: (1) Johnson's Later Literary Career and (2) His Last Years.

Subject Matter of the Essay and Allusions

LESSON 11

a. Review ¶¶ 1–9 and study the notes on those paragraphs.

b. Questions: ¶1. (1) Do you think the long first paragraph a unit? If so, what is the topic of it? If not, what are the topics covered in it? (2) Do you think that most young people would have learned anything by a method of reading like Johnson's? Why did it succeed with him? ¶ 2. (3) How does Macaulay secure coherence between the first and second paragraphs? See Introduction, § 37. (4) How does Oxford differ from an American university? (5) Why should Macrobius have appealed to Johnson — because of Johnson's peculiar abilities or because of the nature of Macrobius's work? ¶ 3. (6) What device of Macaulay's to gain force is notable in ¶ 3? Give examples. (7) What weakness of Macaulay's is evident in the sentences beginning The needy scholar and In every mutiny? See Introduction, § 35. ¶ 4. (8) How long did Johnson actually remain at Oxford? ¶ 5. (9) Can you justify Macaulay's dealing in this one paragraph with the effect of Johnson's privations in general upon his life? See Introduction, § 44, and ¶ 12 of the essay. ¶ 6. (10) What were Johnson's early efforts to earn a living? ¶ 7. (11) What is gained by and what is the danger in Macaulay's mention of the Queensberrys and Lepels? (12) What misrepresentations occur in this paragraph and what possible explanations for them can you imagine? § 35 and note.

c. Explain Jacobite, royal touch, Augustan delicacy of taste, public schools, restorers of learning, either university, Virgilian, grammar school, ecclesiastical court.

d. Look up hypochondriac, torpid, tawdry in an unabridged dictionary — the last word for its interesting derivation.

Lesson 12

a. Review ¶¶ 10–17 and study the notes on those paragraphs.

b. Questions: ¶ 10. (1) What writers can you name in the preceding generation who flourished by the patronage of the great? What writers in the generation following his death who flourished by the patronage of the public? What exception was there to Macaulay's rule that literature was not a profitable occupation? (2) How does Macaulay hold the attention in the sentence describing Fielding's poverty? ¶ 11. (3) Where and under what circumstances had Johnson become acquainted with Hervey? ¶ 12. (4) Do you think Johnson's gluttony and insolence excusable? (5) What characteristics of Macaulay's style does this paragraph illustrate? ¶ 13. (6) What defence is there for Johnson's having deceived his readers in the Debates of the Senate of Lilliput? (7) What is to be said in defence of and against the historical and literary illusions of this paragraph? ¶ 14. (8) What two things prompted Johnson to write his poem London? ¶ 16. (9) Name and describe Johnson's associates during his early years in London. How do you explain a man of his high morals associating with several of them? (10) Find examples in this paragraph of balanced structure. What is the danger in the habitual use of it and does Macaulay fall into this danger?

c. Explain Fielding, Drury Lane, subterranean ordinaries and à la mode beef shops, Senate of Lilliput, Capulets and Montagues, Blues of the Roman Circus against the Greens, Sacheverell, Tom Tempest, ship money, Roundheads, Pope, Horace, Juvenal, bookseller's hack, blue ribands, Covent Garden, Grub Street.

Lesson 13

a. Review ¶¶ 18–33 and study the notes on them.

b. Questions: ¶ 18. (1) How much — in purchasing power — would 1500 guineas be equivalent to now? ¶ 19. (2) How do you account for the fact that Johnson, in whom pride was a dominant trait, sought the favor of Chesterfield, and with whom do you sympathize the more? ¶ 21. (3) How do you explain the shortness of this paragraph? ¶ 22. (4) What devices do you find in this paragraph by which Macaulay secured coherence between the paragraphs and the force of this one? (5) What is the distinction between heroic and blank verse? ¶ 25. (6) What, according to Macaulay, are the merits and defects of

The Rambler? ¶ 27. (7) Why is Johnson's Letter to Chester field called "the declaration of independence of English letters" (8) It is not often that Macaulay makes a slip in coherence, bu there is a misplaced modifier in the last sentence of this para graph. What is the error and how may it be corrected? ¶ 28 (9) What, according to Macaulay, are the merits and the defect of the Dictionary? ¶ 32 and ¶ 33. (10) What are the merit and the defects of Rasselas?

c. Explain Earl of Chesterfield, Wolsey, Sejanus, Demosthenes Cicero, Hannibal, Charles, Addison, Richardson, Lady Mary spunging houses, Miss Lydia Languish, Newton, Hector, Aris totle, the oracle of Delphi.

d. Look up in a dictionary prospectus, patronage, etymologist.

Lesson 14

a. Review ¶¶ 34–40 and study the notes.

b. Questions: ¶ 36. (1) Do you think Churchill justified i his attack upon Johnson for credulity in the Cock Lane Ghos affair and for dishonesty in the delay in publishing the edition o Shakespeare? ¶ 37. (2) What merits does Macaulay find i Johnson's edition of Shakespeare? (3) What defects? To wha extent in your opinion are these defects real? ¶ 38. (4) To what does Macaulay attribute Johnson's powers of conversation — "his colloquial talents"? (5) Boswell once suggested tha the members of The Club could establish a very great college To what extent was this true? ¶ 39. (6) To what extent is Macaulay unfair to Boswell in this paragraph and how do you explain this unfairness? ¶ 40. (7) How does the reminder o Johnson's eccentricities remind us of the theme of the essay? Cf. Introduction, p. 46. (8) What objections are there to Ma caulay's including a description of Johnson's "Fleet Stree Menagerie" in the same paragraph with the account of the Thrales? Do you see any justification for doing so? (9) Who were the members of Johnson's London household?

c. Explain Bute, Polonius, Ben, Aeschylus, Euripides, Sopho cles, Marlowe, Royal Academy, Goldsmith, Reynolds, Burke Garrick, Wilkes, Whitefield, Buck and Maccaroni, Bath.

d. Look up conjectural, emendation, pompous, triads, casuistry

Lesson 15

a. Review ¶¶ 41–52 and study the notes.

b. Questions: ¶ 41. (1) What kind of reception did Johnson receive on his tour of Scotland, and what effect did it have upon his prejudices against the Scotch? ¶ 43. (2) Do you agree with the statement "that the place of books in the public estimation is fixed, not by what is written about them, but by what is written in them"? What about the modern practice of advertising? (3) Why did Johnson think it unwise "to wrangle with detractors whose works are certain to die"? ¶ 44. (4) What inference do you make from Taxation No Tyranny as to the influence of Johnson's prejudices upon his judgment? Does his attitude toward America affect your opinion of him as man or writer? ¶ 45. (5) What explanation is there for Johnson's failure as a political writer? ¶ 47, ¶ 48. (6) What are the merits and the defects of The Lives of the Poets? (7) How do you account for the difference in style between the Life of Savage and the other Lives? ¶ 49. (8) Why should the Life of Gray have been the worst? ¶ 51. (9) Why do you suppose Macaulay was so unfair to Mrs. Thrale in this paragraph? See Introduction, p. 29. ¶ 53. (10) Do you agree that Johnson was "both a great and a good man"? Prove your contention by reference to specific facts.

c. Explain Hebrides, Fingal, Sheridan, wits of Button, Frances Burney, Westminster Abbey, anfractuosities.

d. Look up sophistry, sarcasm, invective, apophthegm.

Review of Macaulay's Style

Lesson 16

a. Review §§ 25–40 of Introduction.

b. Find and list examples (the number to be fixed by the teacher): (1) of coherence between paragraphs secured by transitional phrases or clauses placed at the beginning of a paragraph; (2) of coherence between paragraphs secured by transitional phrases or clauses placed at the end of a paragraph; (3) of coherence secured by words or phrases showing the chronological sequence; (4) of unity of paragraphs secured by a topic sentence standing at the beginning of a paragraph; (5) of unity of paragraphs secured by a topic sentence standing at the end of a paragraph; (6) of unity of paragraphs secured by a topic sentence within the paragraph; (7) of paragraphs lacking unity — containing more than one topic; (8) of force secured by the use of the concrete, i.e., "raw steaks cut from living cows"; (9) of force secured by balance; (10) of exaggeration especially in the free use of superlatives; (11) of careless misstatements.

Review of Johnson's Works

LESSON 17

a. Memorize the list of works in Appendix — in chronologic order and get the dates of each.

b. Questions : (1) What did Pope say of Johnson's translatio into Latin of his Messiah ? (2) What later use did Johnson mak of the knowledge he gained in translating Lobo's Voyage Abyssinia ? (3) What great defect appears in the Parliamentar Debates ? (4) What were the merits and defects of the Life Savage ? (5) What is the subject of the poem London ? (What is the subject of the poem The Vanity of Human Wishes (7) What is the story of Irene and what are the merits and defec of the tragedy ? (8) What are the merits and defects of T Rambler and how does it compare with The Spectator ? (9) Wha are the merits and defects of the Dictionary ? (10) How do The Idler compare with The Rambler ? (11) What is the sto of Rasselas and what are the merits and defects of it as a piece fiction ? (12) What are the circumstances of the publication Johnson's edition of Shakespeare ? What according to M caulay are the merits and defects of the edition and to what exte is Macaulay wrong ? (13) What are the characteristics of Joh son's Journey to the Western Islands ? (14) Why was Taxati No Tyranny a failure ? (15) What are the merits, defects, a inequalities of The Lives of the English Poets ?

GENERAL REVIEW QUESTIONS AND THEME TOPICS SELECTED FROM COLLEGE ENTRANCE EXAMINATIONS

LESSONS 18 ff.

NOTE

a. The answers to these questions should be written out possible.

b. Attention should be called to the College Entrance Exam nation Board's directions : " No paper will be considered sat factory if seriously defective in grammar, spelling, or punctu tion."

(c) Neatness and good penmanship are also of great importan See the Board's excellent pamphlet of Suggestions and Aids College Candidates in English (Document No. 100, July 15, 192 " The candidate should write plainly and neatly, for the read are only human, and are irritated by undecipherable manuscript. They are correspondingly pleased at evident attempts at neatness." [1]

QUESTIONS AND TOPICS

(Arranged Alphabetically by Institutions)

1. Give the main facts of Dr. Johnson's life. (Amherst)
2. Discuss the moral qualities and power to fight the battle of life that were characteristic of Samuel Johnson. (Amherst)
3. What was Dr. Johnson's most important trait of character? What influence did it have on his work? How does it contribute to his greatness? (Amherst)
4. Write a character sketch of Samuel Johnson. Have you any reason to think Macaulay's picture . . . untrustworthy in any respect? (Amherst)
5. What famous men were personal friends of Dr. Johnson, and for what were they famous? (College Entrance Examination Board)
6. Show how Johnson's inherited tendencies and education affected his success. Did he succeed in spite of them or because of them? (Board)
7. "Never since literature became a calling in England had it been a less gainful calling than at the time when Johnson took up his residence in London." How does Macaulay account for this condition? How did the situation affect Johnson? (Board)
8. Dr. Johnson's ability as a writer of literary biography. (Board)
9. From your study of Macaulay's essay explain in what ways "the memory of Johnson keeps many of his works alive." (Board)
10. Name and briefly characterize four works of Samuel Johnson, each representing a different kind of composition. (Board)
11. What, according to Macaulay, was Johnson's chief weakness as a lexicographer? (Board)
12. In what respects did Macaulay think Johnson ill-qualified to bring out an edition of Shakespeare? (Board)
13. After your reading of this essay, what should you say of Macaulay as a critic of men and of literature? (Board)
14. Mention three literary qualities of Johnson and three of Macaulay, as shown by Macaulay's Life of Johnson, and comment

[1] No student should be allowed to take any college entrance examination in English without having mastered this pamphlet.

in detail, and by reference to the work, on any one of these si qualities. (Board)

15. Write on one of the following topics : (a) Handicaps whic make Johnson's success remarkable. (b) Macaulay's skill as writer. (Board)

16. Give some account of Johnson's friends, and explain thei admiration of him and his influence among them. (Board)

17. The Literary Club meets at Sir Joshua's. (Board)

18. What peculiarities of person and manners and what in firmities of character interfered with Johnson's happiness an success in life ? (Bowdoin)

19. What are the most outstanding characteristics of Johnson the man, and Johnson, the writer ? (Bowdoin)

20. Describe as fully and as definitely as you can the styl
(not the thought) of Macaulay. (Brown)

21. Mention three of Johnson's literary qualities, and cit particular instances where they are shown. (Brown)

22. Why is Macaulay's Life of Johnson interesting ? (Brown

23. Discuss Johnson's influence on the other literary men o his time. (Dartmouth)

24. Summarize the chief characteristics of Johnson as given b
Macaulay. (Dartmouth)

25. Name the chief works of Johnson. Which does Ma caulay consider the best and why ? (Dartmouth)

26. What were Johnson's outstanding virtues ? (Dartmouth)

27. How did Johnson's habits of life change after he receive the pension from Lord Bute ? (Dartmouth)

28. Give a brief character sketch of Savage. (Dartmouth)

29. What is meant by " patronage of the great " ? How wa
Johnson affected by it or by the lack of it ? (Dartmouth)

30. What literary qualities are implied by the terms John sonian and Macaulayan ? (Harvard, adapted)

31. How do you explain the power and charm of Johnson conversation ? (W. P. I.)

32. What was Macaulay's theory of the life of Dr. Johnson
Show how Macaulay has this theory in mind at all time
(W. P. I.)

INDEX

Abyssinia, 62, 117, 149
Addison, Joseph, 78, 127, 148
Aeneid, The, 117
Aeschylus, 90, 136
A la mode beef shops, 66, 119
Almon and Stockdale, 105, 143
America. Macaulay's prejudice against, 30
Anfractuosities, 114, 148
Apophthegm of Bentley, 104, 143
Aristotle, 86, 132, 133
Attic, 56, 115
Augustan Age, 115
Augustan delicacy of taste, 58, 115
Aversion to Scotch, 69, 122

Bath, 99, 141
Beauclerk, Topham, 94, 140
Beaumont, 90, 136
Beggars' Opera, 65, 119
Ben (see Jonson)
Bentincks, 87, 134
Bentley, Richard, 104, 143
Bibliography, 53
Bill of Rights Society, 95, 140
Blank verse, 76, 127
Blue ribands, 124
Blues of the Roman circus, 68, 120
Bookseller's hack, 70, 124
Boswell, James, 94; as biographer, 51; according to Macaulay, 51; the true, 52
Boyse, 71, 124
Brighton, 99, 141
Bruce's Travels, 85, 132
Burke, Edmund, 92, 138
Burney, Frances, 112, 148
Buck, 98, 141
Busy, Mrs., 79, 128
Bute, Lord, 87, 134
Button, wits of, 107, 144

Calvinistic Methodists, 95, 140
Capulets, 68, 120
Cave, Edward, 67, 120
Cavendishes, 87, 134
Character of Macaulay, 28
Charles, Johnson's, 75, 126
Chesterfield, Earl of, 73, 125; Johnson's letter to, 129
Christ Church, 59, 116
Chronological tables, 154
Churchill, Charles, 88, 134
Cibber, Colley, 107, 144
Cicero, 75, 126
City, the, 133
Clarendon, Earl of, 68, 121
Classification of essays, 11
Club, The, 93, 94
Cock Lane Ghost, 88, 134
College entrance examination questions, 166
Congreve, William, 113, 148.
Continental connections, 69, 122
Covent Garden, 72, 124
Cowley, Abraham, 106, 144, 148

Decker, 90, 136
Delphi, oracle of, 86, 133

Demosthenes, 75, 126
Denham, Sir John, 113, 148
Descriptive list of Johnson's chief works, 149
Development of essay in England, 10
Dictionary of the English Language, 74, 81, 82, 150
Dissenters and stock-jobbers, 69, 122
Dodington, George Bubb, 77, 128
Drury Lane, 66, 119; theatre, 79, 129
Dryden, John, 108, 145, 148
Duke of Newcastle, 67, 120
Dunciad, 123

Eccentricities of Johnson, 60
Ecclesiastical court of the diocese, 62, 117
Either university, 58, 116
Ephesian matron, 111, 147
Essay as a Form of Literature, 9; classification of, 11; development in England of, 10; origin of, 9
Essayist, Macaulay as, 36
Eton, 58, 115
Excise and the army, 69, 122
Euripides, 90, 136

Falkland, Viscount, 68, 121
Fielding, Henry, 65, 119
Fingal, 103, 142
Fleet Street, 99, 142
Fletcher, 90, 136
Ford, 90, 136
Frederick, Louis, 77, 128

Garrick, David, 64, 75, 92, 118, 139
Gay, John, 113, 148
Gentleman commoner, 59, 116
Gentleman's Magazine, 67, 120
George the Third, 87, 133
Gibbon, Edward, 92, 138
Goldsmith, Oliver, 92, 137
Grammar school, 62, 117
Gray, Thomas, 108, 146
Great Rebellion, 69, 122
Greens of Roman circus, 68, 120
Grub Street, 72, 125
Gulliver's Travels, 145
Gunnings, The, 79, 128

Hamlet, 111, 147
Hampden, John, 68, 121
Hannibal, 75, 126
Hardwicke, Lord, 67, 120
Harleian Library, 67, 120
Harley, Robert, 120
Hartley, David, 77, 128
Hebrides, 100, 142, 152
Hector, 86, 132, 133
Hervey, Harry, 65
Historian, Macaulay as a, 35
History, The, 23
Hoole, John, 71, 124
Horace, 70, 122

Idler, The, 82, 151
Imlac, 85, 131
India, Macaulay's work in, 21
India Penal Code, 21
Irene, 64, 76, 150

Jacobite, 115
Jenyns's Inquiry, 82, 131
Johnson Samuel, compared with Juvenal, 122; defects as a critic, 50; early life of, 55; eccentricities of, 60; essays on, 44; fame to-day, 50; influence of the times on, 46; marriage of, 63; works of, 149.
Johnson's Charles, 75, 126

Johnson's Club, 93, 94
Jones, Sir William, 92, 138
Jonson, Ben, 90, 135
Journey to the Hebrides, 102, 152
Julio Romano, 86, 133
Junius, Franz, 81, 131
Juvenal, 70, 74, 75, 122, 125
Juvenal's Hannibal, 75, 126

Lady Mary, 79, 128
Langton, Bennet, 92, 139
Latin book about Abyssinia, 62, 117
Laud, William, 68, 121
Lennox, Mrs. Charlotte, 85, 132
Lepels, 63, 118
Lesson assignments, 159
Life of Johnson, compared with Review of Croker's Boswell, 45; theme of, 45
Life of Savage, 73, 150
Lilliput, 67, 120
Literary tastes, 49
Literature, state of, in Johnson's time, 64
Lives of the English Poets, 107, 153
London, influence of, on Johnson, 46; life in, in Johnson's time, 47
London, 70, 149
Lord Privy Seal, 86, 133
Lydia Languish, Miss, 84, 131

Macaulay, as essayist, 36; as historian, 35; as orator, 34; as poet, 33; character of, 28; compared with Johnson, 43; early writings of, 18; life of, 13; memory of, 18; on Johnson, 44; personality of, 25; political career of, 19; position of, in English literature, 33; precocity of, 14; style of, 39, 165; the man, 25
Maccaroni, 98, 141
Macrobius, 59, 117
Macpherson, James, 103, 142
Malone, Edward, 108, 146
Mansfield, Lord, 102, 142
Marlowe, Christopher, 90, 136
Marriage of Johnson, 63
Massinger, 90, 136
Maxime, etc., 104, 142
Meeting of Dr. Johnson and Wilkes, 156
Messiah, Pope's, 59, 117, 149
Method of studying essays, 12
Mitre Tavern, 100, 142
Montague, Lady Mary, 79, 128
Montagues, 68, 120
Monthly Review, 79, 129
Murray, William, 142
Music-master from Brescia, 110, 146

Nekayah, 85, 131
Newcastle, Duke of, 67, 120
Newgate, 71, 124
Newton, Sir Isaac, 85, 132

Oracle of Delphi, 86, 133
Orator, Macaulay as, 34
Orrery, John Boyle, 107, 145
Osborne, 67, 120
Oxford, 58, 116, 133

Pamela, 119
Parliamentary Debates, 149
Pasquin, 65, 119
Pekuah, 85, 131
Pembroke College, 58, 116
Personal appearance of Macaulay, 25
Personality of Macaulay, 25
Petrarch, 58, 116
Philippics, 126
Piazza of Covent Garden, 72, 124
Piozzi, Gabriel, 110, 146

Pit of Drury Lane theater, 79, 129
Plan for a Dictionary of the English Language, 150
Plays of William Shakespeare, The, 89, 151
Poet, Macaulay as a, 33
Politian, 62, 118
Political conditions, 48
Polonius, 89, 135
Pope, Alexander, 70, 122, 123
Pope's Dunciad, 123
Pope's Messiah, 59, 117, 149
Porter, Mrs. Elizabeth, 62
Prejudices of Macaulay, 29
Prior, Matthew, 113, 148
Prime Minister, 125
Prince Frederick, 77, 128
Psalmanazar, George, 71, 124
Public schools of England, 58, 115
Pulteney, William, 67, 120

Queen Anne, 56
Queensberrys, 63, 118
Questions and topics, 167
Rambler, The, 77, 128, 150
Rasselas, 84, 85, 131, 151

Renaissance, The, 116
Restorers of learning, 58, 116
Review of Johnson's works, 166
Review of Macaulay's style, 165
Reynolds, Sir Joshua, 92, 137
Richardson, Samuel, 77, 127
Robertson, William, 109, 146
Romeo and Juliet, 120
Roundheads, 68, 121
Royal Academy, 90, 136
Royal touch, 56, 115
Rulers of that society, 58, 116

Sacheverell, 68, 121
Saturnalia, 117
Savage, Richard, 71, 73, 124, 145; Life of, 73, 150
Scotch, aversion to, 69, 122
Seasons, The, 119
Sejanus, 74, 125
Senate of Lilliput, 67, 120
Septennial parliaments, 69, 122
Shakespeare, Johnson's edition of, 89, 151
Sheridan, Richard Brinsley, 106, 143
Sheridan, Mrs. Frances, 85, 132
Ship money, 68, 121
Sir Roger, 79, 128
Sixth form at Eton, 58, 115
Skinner, Stephen, 81, 131
Solemn and tender prayer, 111, 147
Somersets, 87, 134
Sophocles, 90, 136
Southwark, 98, 141
Sovereigns in possession, 55, 115
Spectator, The, 77, 127
Spunging-houses, 82, 131
Squire Bluster, 79, 128
St. James Square, 124
Stockdale, 105, 143
Stock-jobbers, 69, 122
Streatham, 98, 141
Stuart line, 115
Style, Macaulay's, 39, 165
Subterranean ordinaries, 66, 119
Swift, Jonathan, 107, 145

Tatler, The, 77, 127
Taxation No Tyranny, 105, 143, 152
Tenth Satire of Juvenal, 74, 125
Theme topics, 166
Thomson, James, 65, 119
Thrales, the, 96–98, 109
Tom Tempest, 68, 121
Tooke, John Horne, 81, 130

Tories, 31, 120
Usher of a grammar school, 62, 117
Vanity of Human Wishes, 74, 150
Virgilian, 59, 117
Voyage to Abyssinia, translation of, 117, 149
Walmesley, Gilbert, 62, 117
Walpole, Robert, 48, 120
Warburton, 73, 125
Webster, 90, 136
Westminster Abbey, 113, 148
Whigs, 31, 32, 120
Whitefield, George, 95, 140
Wilhelm Meister, 89, 135
Wilkes, John, 95, 140; meeting of Johnson with, 156
Wilson, Richard, 106, 144
Windham, William, 112, 147
Wits of Button, 107, 144
Wolsey, 74, 125
Women, Macaulay's prejudice against, 29
Wyndhams, 87, 133
Young, Edward, 77, 128

MAIN PR3533 .M3 1923
Macaulay, Th Macaulay's Life of Johnson
39205000141234

DATE DUE

DISCARDED BY MILWAUKEE SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING
LIBRARY

D8 Fordham Equip. Co.

Macaulay's Life

1800 Born

1818 – Trinity College

1822 – B.A. degree

1824 – M.A.

1825 – Fellowship – Edinburgh

1830 – M.P.

1834 – Sailed for India as member of Supreme Council

1834-8 Code of Indian Laws. Educational Report

1838 – Back to England

1855 – History of England Vol. I.

1842 – Lays of Ancient Rome

1859 – Death

LIBRARY OF MILWAUKEE
SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING

08-CBC-569